HERE was a neatness and dispatch about the man's lying which commanded instant attention and gave him the floor after his first recital. The little crowd of passengers narrowed around the waiting-room stove and forgot their delayed connection, while he related the thrilling experience of himself and friend aboard a Chinese man-of-war during the battle of Yalu River.

"Just time for one more, pardner," said the red-faced man in the yachting cap. "If your throat's dry, have a look at this."

The "look" at the proffered flask had its direct result. The raconteur's tongue ran even more rapidly and he spoke with much greater

"My baptismal was something like Reichardt Wemys; but I have since contracted sufficient aliases to fill a city directory. The Duke of Grandtly has always been a favorite title, standing as it does for some of my most successful operations-instance the affair at Brookline.

"Having annexed a splendid string of matched pearls in London, we had hurried across the Atlantic in order to dispose of them for something like their true value. Dempsy was playing valet to my 'ludship' when we arrived in Boston. Over in the Back Bay district they rose to me like hungry trout after a red fly, and in two weeks I was completely swallowed, title and all.

"It was about this time that Dempsy grew jealous of my delightful position, and urged me to have done. Sentiment has always been my weak point, and on account of a Miss Greyton, for whom I had contracted a violent passion, I delayed operations until Dempsy threatened in his vulgar fashion to make a spill of the whole lay.

"Not without some compunction, I finally exhibited the pearls to Miss Greyton's amiable father, pleading my penury and family pride. An offer of five thousand was made on the spot. By deftly concocting a pedigree for each pearl, I succeeded in forcing the price up another thousand.

"The following day, an expert having passed on the pearls, Mr. Greyton wrote a check for six thousand dollars, and accompanied me to the bank in order that I might be identified. Furthermore, he confided to me that the pearls were intended as a present for his daughter on her twenty-first birthday.

"Dempsy received his share of the money and straightway vanished. Knowing well that they were nothing but paste, and poor paste at he would return sooner or later. I made myself comfortable and waited. Much of my time was spent at the Greytons, for Miss Louise insisted on having the history of each pearl repeated until she, herself, was familiar with every detail. It was a terrible tax on my imagination and memory, but I managed it creditably and never told two stories about the same pearl.

"Dempsy had been gone almost a month pinched tonight. Got it straight." when I received my first call from the beautiful Mrs. Park-Simons.

SAME PRICE

"'I have come to you for help and advice in a great difficulty,' were her first words.

"'My dear madame,' I replied, 'you may rely on my secrecy and discretion.'

"'Thank you,' she cried gratefully. 'The truth of the matter is, I foolishly borrowed Miss Greyton's pearls, intending to wear them last night. They have been stolen from my room. I do not mind the loss if it is possible to replace them at once. We sail for Europe in three days. Can you remember just how they looked? I dare not tell Miss Greyton; she prized them so highly on account of their associations-the length of time they have been in your family, and all that.'

"I expressed a belief that the jewelers of the city might be able to duplicate the string from their various stocks. After the most urgent solicitation on the part of the lady, I consented to undertake the commission, my instructions being to spare no expense and never acquaint Miss Greyton with the deception.

"Scarcely had Mrs. Park-Simons departed when the familiar face of Dempsy arose from behind a divan. He winked several times in quick succession.

"'You villain!' I cried, the truth suddenly flashing across my mind, 'you lifted those pearls yourself!'

"Dempsy gravely shook his head.

"'Where are they?' I demanded.

"From one of his pockets he withdrew a small green ticket and held it before my eyes. The pearls had been pawned-pawned for fivehundred dollars.

"'The old fence knew they were stolen," Dempsy pleaded, vainly endeavoring to stay my wrath. 'He wouldn't give me a cent more. But if you want 'em for the lady, there's a turn that 'll bring the old boy up standing.' And with that he slid out of the room, reappearing later in the day with a policeman's uniform and a forged warrant for the arrest of the pawnbroker.

"It was a game we had often played before. and, as anticipated, everything worked smoothly. We cornered the pawn-broker in a little room back of his shop, and there Dempsy opened the seance.

"'I's pinched,' he growled, 'an' I've blowed. The cop wants you an' the pearls.'

"'You have long been suspected of these transactions,' I observed, flourishing my warrant before the trembling little animal. This affair will doubtless wind up your career for all time. You are the most dangerous fence in the city. Produce the stolen pearls.'

"'Take them, my friend,' he said; 'but don't say anything about it. I don't want to get a bad reputation.' "'Impossible!' I replied. 'The law must take its course.'

"The old fellow slyly introduced a hundred dollar bill in my hand and winked knowingly. "'Well,' I hesitated, 'perhaps this time we can let the matter drop, after restoring the property.'

"But where do I come in?' Dempsy complained. 'What's to prevent my leaking?'

"It took fifty dollars to purchase Dempsy's silence, but the old pawn-broker was only too glad to escape so easily.

"While I was shedding my policeman's uniform at our rooms, I saw Dempsy fingering the pearls, and slyly chuckling over our little piece of roguery.

"'How much will you tax the grand dame for the dewdrops, pard?' he questioned.

"'A sufficiency,' I replied. 'Clear out now, will you. she's almost due "Mrs. Park-Simons winced at the price, but she was a thoroughbred and cleared the bars at a bound. There was no paying on the installment plan.

"Not long after this transaction, Dempsy's sharp eyes discovered that we were being shadowed. Some of our English friends had doubtless crossed the water on a hunting expedition. At all events the city would soon become too warm for our comfort, so we diligently turned our attentions to time tables and sailing lists. In this condition of mind I went to make a farewell call on Miss Greyton.

"'I am so glad you have come,' she said. 'I have forgotten the history of one pearl, and you must drill me in it again.'

"She produced the string of pearls, and at the same instant I made a startling discoverythat. Cutting short my visit, I started on the hunt of Dempsy. He was just entering the union station when I laid hands on him.

"'You old thief!' I panted.

"'Not so loud,' he cautioned, a dangerous glitter in his eye. "'You have them,' I asked.

"'You don't need to guess again,' he grinned. 'Thought I'd better load up. We're goin' to be "'Give them to me, and light out,' I whisper-

"'Not on your life,' he sneered. 'This was a little deal of my own.'

"'Surrounded as we were on all sides, I drew my revolver and pressed the muzzle against his breast. For an instant he hesitated; then I felt a small packet slipped into my coat pocket.

"It was just ten o'clock when I again boarded the car for Brookline. The Greytons I knew would by that time have departed for a neighboring function, and the servants would all be in bed. The coast seemed clear for my little game of philanthropy-or whatever you may choose to call it. Effecting an entrance. I proceeded to Miss Greyton's apartments and secured the case containing the fake pearls. It was my intention to restore the genuine string and then follow Dempsy to pastures new. Just as the case opened in my hand, a voice sounded at my side.

"'I found it very hard to believe that you were a common thief,' Miss Greyton said quietly "Instinctively my hand closed over my revolver, and I sprang toward the door. The moon was shining in at the open window and a glance showed me that the young woman had sunk down on a couch, burying her face in her hands.

"'You have nothing to fear,' she said, as I tried to creep away. 'The detectives are now watching your rooms. They made me their only confidante. I sent a warning to you by a faithful messenger. Humiliating as the confession is. I would do anything in my power to shield you from the law and to assist you to escape.

"A moment longer I stood silent and confounded. Then came the words hot and incoherent. I told her of my life, my sorrows, of the injustice I had suffered, of my fall from a position of honor and trust. I concealed nothing. She listened patiently. Taking courage, I detailed the episode of the pearls and explained my presence there that night.

'Thank God!' she cried out, 'you are not all bad. There is at least a spark of manhood which has not smouldered out. There is just one thing more and then I want you to go-out of my sight and out of my mind forever. Promise that you will try to live the life of an honest man, deceiving no one, and striving to make some heart happy in this hard, cruel world.

"It is needless to say that I promised. 'It only remains for me to restore the pearls,' I said, fumbling at Dempsy's package.

"'Nothing would induce me to touch them again,' she said. 'Take them away.'

"By this time the package was opened, but instead of the pearls there was a glittering array of diamonds.

"'My mother's!' cried Miss Greyton. 'Oh, where will this terrible business end!'

"Well," asked the man with the lobster eves and yellow suit-case, as the narrator arose and began to button his coat, "where did it end anyhow? Did you both escape?"

"I have never seen Dempsy since," Mr. Wemys replied shortly.

"I suppose," interjected another listener, that Dempsy exchanged those pearls, and still has the originals?"

"Naturally."

"He did not," said the red-faced man with the yachting cap and flask. "The Park-Simons' gang took the originals back to England with the rest of their loot; in fact, they were arrested while trying to privately dispose of them. It's an old game of theirs. I was cabled up the American end of the case know so much about the affair, Mr. Grandtly, or Wemys, or whoever you are, that you must come along with me. I insist! The other wrist, too, please. Thank you. Would you prefer the baggage car or a day coach? That was our train whistling." 36

AM to be initiated into the Ancient Order of Nocturnals tonight. my dear," said Harold Brown to his wife across the dinner table.

"How many societies does that make, Harold, that you now belong to?" asked Mrs. Brown, with a sigh.

"Oh, that's only six benefit organizations, besides my three clubs," was the reply. "Of course my duties to these institutions deprive me of many pleasant hours in your society, my dear, but you must remember that in the event of my death you will receive a sufficient sum to keep you in comfort, indeed, I may say, in comparative affluence."

"Yes, I know all about that, Harold," said Mrs. Brown, who like nearly all married women never seriously considered the idea of her husband's death. "Still, your lodges and clubs keep you out so late at night that I'm afraid your health will suffer."

"Oh, I think not," replied Harold as he arose from the table and put on his overcoat. "Now don't sit up for me, because I shall not be home until two o'clock at least."

With a hasty parting kiss Harold bade his wife good by and the door closed behind him; then began another one of those long, dreary evenings for Mrs. Brown which had been so frequent for nearly three years. Somehow the savor had gone out of life for her. She recalled with deep regret the evenings eternities away, when Harold lay upon the lounge while she played his favorite nocturnes and etudes. She remembered distinctly the time when he had joined the Married Men's League, and the doleful tolling of the church clock as it marked the slowly passing hours while he was away. And when, three months later, Harold had announced his election to the exalted office of Chief Sword-Swallower of the Sons of Rest, she had felt no elation. Indeed, she resented his preferment as another encroachment upon her privileges as a wife. It meant to her one less trolley-ride a week, one more evening shy at the theatre. But, as time went on her husband became more lax in the discharge of his domestic duties, and assumed the office of Grand Polisher of the Armor-Bearers. She had mildly protested at this distinction, but Herold partly won her over with the argument that the office would help him in his business and give him a wider acquaintance. This argument the wives of "j'iners" have heard very often and with the unreasonableness of women have never believed.

By this time Mrs. Brown began to realize that lodge-joining had become a habit with her husband. He talked of nothing else. The house was littered with pamphlets and papers concerning lodges. Harold became positive that lodges of various kinds would ultimately solve the great question of co-operation. emancipate the laboring man from his thralldom, and teach capitalists a powerful lesson in Christian charity.

In order that he might spread these ideas among the ignorant masses Harold became a member of the Ancient and Honorable Order of After-Dinner Speakers. When Mrs. Brown objected mildly Harold told her that it was necessary for him to improve his oratory and the after-dinner-society would furnish him with the opportunity to do so.

Up to this time Mrs. Brown had believed. like the faithful wife she was, that Harold's arguments were unanswerable. Having complete confidence in his discretion and judgment, she had never even suspected that his logic was deceptive and his actions regarding lodges somewhat reprehensible. But the mention of the after-dinner speakers aroused her to serious thought on the subject.

She reasoned to herself: What right had her

She saw, with a fluttering heart, that her cheeks were not so rosy as they had been, and there was a pallor on her face which she had never noticed before. Was that a wrinkle in her forehead? Yes. And there were several little crow's feet near her eyes. Mrs. Brown also noticed with dismay that her hair was not | your lodge dues and assessments, not oneso carefully arranged as it might have been, and she had placed no roses in the clustering brown tresses. Her dress was neat and attractive, but it was not of the color that Harold liked. She was deciding to remedy all time is taken up looking after my medicines these defects so far as possible, when her thoughts were disturbed by the ringing of the door-bell and the appearance of Ellen with a letter in her hand.

"Madam", said Ellen, "there's a leddy down stairs that axed me would I give you this." The letter read as follows:

DEAR MRS. HAROLD BROWN:—The bearer, Mrs. Roger Van Rensselaer, is a person of eminent respectability who desires to see you on a matter of business. You may rely absolutely upon her trustworthiness.

Yours sincerely, REV. S. H. TAYLOR.

St. Lukes' M. E. Parsonage.

Seated in the parlor, Mrs. Van Rensselaer began at once: "Permit me, Mrs. Brown, to express my thanks for your very cordial reception. My husband died about two months ago, leaving me in reduced circumstances. Since that time I have been forced to earn my own living. I have been so fortunate as to meet the celebrated Mrs. Wisdom, originator of the Elixir of Life, the Essence of Physical Immortality, the worldremowned Lilac-Blossom Butter, and a dozen other remedies for beautifying and rejuvenating the female person. I have become an agent to present her discoveries to the public. You know, my dear Mrs. Brown, that male physicians are lamentably ignorant of the ills to which we week women are subject. Mrs. Wisdom is a pupil of the Yogi's of India, a graduated physician, and a woman of extraordinary gifts. Her remedies have this advantage, that if they do not cure they will do no harm. For instance, I notice that your cheeks home as early as you can, won't you, my love." have a sallow appearance. This indicates that your liver is inactive. I would advise you to take one teaspoonful of Mrs. Wisdom's Deodorizer ($2 per bottle) on rising in the morning, he jumped on a car. and one teaspoonful of Corpuscle Tonic ($3 per of Marvellous Secret ($5 per bottle) in each her chair, she soliloquized: pint of water. This remarkable remedy was found by Mrs. Wisdom in the Delphic Temple in Delhi, where the celebrated oracles were made. After bathing, wash carefully with with a rough towel and apply Emollient Lotion No. 1 ($1 per box). Allow lotion to dry on. Before retiring, apply Emollient Lotion No. 2 ($1.50 per box), and let it remain on the skin all night. The Lilac Blossom Butter may be used twice a week in place of Lotion No. 2 ($3 per box; small boxes $2)."

Here Mrs. Van Rensselaer ran out of breath and enabled Mrs. Brown to ask:

"Have you anything which will remove wrinkles?"

"Yes, indeed," replied Mrs. Van Rensselaer eagerly.

"The Blood and Liver Tonic ($3 per bottle) is warranted to remove moth patches and wrinkles. In connection with this you might | face was covered with a substance which lookuse Mrs. Wisdom's Skin Food. This is an infallible remedy. Used judiciously, together swathed in bandages which resembled boxingwith the Blood and Liver Tonic, the Complexion Bleach, the Corpuscle Tonic, the Excelsior Soap, and the various emollient lotions, it is sure to make your skin like a rose-leaf. Then he said: Excuse me, I forgot to tell you that the Skin Food comes in two sizes, price $1.50 and $2.00."

When Mrs. Van Rensselaer went away half an hour later she was in a very pleasant frame of mind. She had made a bargain with Mrs. Brown which included all of the tonics, lotions emollients, bleaches, and other preparations in her catalogue.

The next day a large box arrived by express at the house, containing nearly forty bottles and hoxes of various mixtures. The clock, the vases, and the various ornaments were removed from the dining-room mantels, and in their places were arrayed the bottles and boxes. Each bore a flaming legend in gold letters.

Mr. Brown gazed in amazement at this formidable array when he came in to dinner.

"Are you starting a drug store, my dear?" he asked his wife.

"Oh no," she replied with charming ingenuousness. "But, Harold, I have not been well for some time. I have not said anything about it to you, for fear that you might feel impelled to stay at home and thus neglect your lodge duties, which I know are important and imperative. Still, I have consulted the renowned Mrs. Wisdom, and she says I am in a really husband to neglect her in the way he did? so much recently that my nerves and muscles Philanthropy began at home, and if anybody | have become flaccid. Mrs. Wisdom says that was entitled to be entertained and instructed her Skin Food is an infallible remedy for this weakness. You will notice, my love, that those naughty wrinkles near my eyes are going away, that perhaps she was to blame. Impossible! and I have used the Blood and Liver Tonic only once. Just think of that, darling."

Darling grunted his disbelief, and Mrs. Brown resumed:

"Really, I am delighted that I went to see this charming woman, Harold. In the course of a month I shall be as youthful and charming as I was before you joined the Nocturnals."

"But, my dear," said Harold, "isn't this rather expensive?"

"Why no, you silly fellow. That's the charm about it. It isn't one quarter so expensive as quarter. Besides, it keeps me busy in the long hours when you are away educating the masses, and I do so want to make myself attractive in your eyes. You would hardly believe how my in their proper order. In the morning I must take the Deodorizer for the coarse pores in my hands. At noon I must not forget my Corpuscle Tonic, besides the Marvellous Secret for my general health and-

"Yes, yes, I suppose so," said Harold impatiently. "But you can tell me the rest tomorrow. I am in a hurry. The Special Commandery of the Armor-Bearers meets to-night, and I must bid you good-by."

Harold raised his wife's chin for the customary parting kiss, but she sprang away exclaim-

"Harold, how careless of you! My lips are covered with Mrs. Wisdom's Lilac Blossom Butter. It has been on for only three hours and it must remain for twelve hours at least to prove of any service. You naughty fellow, I'm ashamed of you."

Harold had never been repulsed before by his wife, and he was as much surprised as if a trolley-car had struck him.

"All right," he exclaimed as he strode toward the door. "I can assure you that I will not offend in a similar manner again soon."

Scarcely had he reached the foot of the stairs, when his wife cried over the balusters:

"Oh, Harold, won't you please stop at Gazzam's on your way down town and get me a small bottle of Mrs. Wisdom's Pepsin Gastric Promoter. Get a small bottle for $2, that's a dear. I want it for indigestion. You know I have had no exercise to speak of since you joined the After-Dinner Society. And you'll come

"Ha, ha! That Gastric Promoter broke his heart, poor fellow. And when he didn't get the kiss, I thought I should burst out laughing in his face, he looked so glum. I never Mrs. Wisdom's Soap (25 cents per cake). Dry heard of such remarkable medicine before. It is working wonders."

Harold came home unusually early that night. He had a half-defined idea that his wife's mind was affected, and felt a trifle remorseful. But in the morning she greeted him with the old-time affectionate smile, a trifle marred, perhaps, because it shone through a thick covering of grease-paint mixture called Emollient No. 2.

For a week Mrs. Brown talked of nothing but Mrs. Wisdom's magical remedies, until Harold was driven to desperation. But the climax was reached when one morning he came home at 3 o'clock and found his wife lying in a reclining chair apparently asleep. Her ed like whitewash, while her hands were gloves.

Harold was a man of action when roused. He shook his wife roughly until she awoke.

"Nellie, I'm getting sick of this greasy lotion, marvellous emollient the deodorizer, skin-food nonsense, and I'll quit the Sons of Rest."

"But how about the Armor-Bearers?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"Well, I'll let them go, too. I'm getting tired of them anyhow."

"How about the After-Dinner Speakers and the Nocturnals?"

"Look here, Nellie. If the Corpuscle Tonic and the Lilac Blossom Butter go into the sewer, I'll give them all up."

"You dear boy, of course they shall all go if it will please you. But there is no use in throwing the bottles away, because they contain only coffee and blueing water. I bought only the labels and the empty bottles from Mrs. Wisdom."

"What!"

"Yes, you great goose. The Lilac Blossom Butter was only tomato ketchup, and the Skin Food rye flour.'

Then they laughed, Harold a little shamefacedly. But when Mrs. Brown went into the bath-room a minute later, there was a little clean spot upon her rounded cheek and upon dangerous condition. I have remained in-doors | Harold's lips a suspicious whiteness.

ROWN was thoroughly outdone. Here he was six miles from home. the rain falling steadily, his sisterin-law expected on the down train in half an hour, and not a conveyance obtainable. It would not have been such an uncompromising situation if they had not telegraphed Sister Lou was very ill, and to come prepared for an invalid. The liveryman lent a sympathetic ear, but was helpless to cope with circumstances. Every buggy and surrey in the stable had gone to camp-meeting that day, and would not be in until after the evening service. There was absolutely nothing left in the stable.

"But I tell you, man, I am obliged to get home tonight," insisted Brown, "for my wife is alone and expecting me. She would never imagine a state of things like this, and if I should wait until morning there would be two invalids on my hands instead of one. Haven't you a spring wagon or something on wheels?"

"There is just one wheeled thing left, Brown the hearse."

"The hearse." Brown echoed the words mechanically, looking out at the rain and chewing his moustache dejectedly. Then grim necessity bred an awful inspiration in his brain. "Why man, what better? It would be the very thing for a sick person, a regular ambulance in fact, and no better protection from the weather could be afforded. Besides, it will be night and we will probably not meet a soul on the way. Why not use that?"

"But the thought of it!" remonstrated the liveryman.

"Oh. the thought of it amounts to nothing," said Brown, who was not troubled with an over supply of imagination, "it is a question of ventilation. Can you arrange that?"

They pulled the black object from its place and examined it, finding that by proper adjustment it could be made to accommodate the living as well as the dead.

"Hitch her up," ordered Brown without further parley.

But the man still hesitated. "How about the patient herself? Do you suppose she will be willing to ride in it?"

"If she is as sick as they say, she won't know the difference. Besides it will be padded up with quilts and such things inside, and it will be so dark she will never see the outside. Of course I don't expect you to tack on the plumes and other regalia like a high noon funeral, but rub it down as decent and sober as you can. Then come down to the depot and help me load up. After that I can manage."

"Well of all nervy undertakings! I've been in the business a long time, Brown, but this takes the ribbon. You can have the thing and I won't charge you a cent for the funeral."

In less than half an hour Centerville's one conveyance for the dead was at Brown's disposal, and that victor over contending circumstances, anxious but elated, mounted the high seat and drove down to the deserted depot, halting in the deep shadow of the building, where the light from the one street lamp near by could not penetrate.

When the train came in it was a delicate task, and the success of the experiment seemed to depend upon getting the invalid into this improvised ambulance without arousing her suspicion. But so ill was she indeed, that when the crucial moment arrived she most opportunely lost consciousness, and Brown and the man he had taken into his confidence, stowed her away without encountering any serious difficulty.

So out into the thickening darkness drove Brown, perched alone upon the front of that gruesome vehicle, with no mourners to share the tedium of the journey, and only old Jacob, the rat-terrier, to bring up the procession in the rear. The rain continued to fall and the five miles of gloomy woodland which stretched before him looked dark and menacing.

Brown thought of something now which had not occurred to him before in his anxiety to reach home that night—that the man who murdered old man Jackson a few days before was said to be a fugitive from justice in that very woods. Indeed, a posse from town that day had scoured the swamps in search of him, and returned to report the discovery of footprints in a bog some miles below. What if, rendered desperate by hunger and pursuit, this escaped criminal should turn robber as well as murderer and fall upon unoffending travelers. True, it would be a very desperate character indeed who would attack a hearse with any hope of reward, but in the dense gloom of this night he would not be able to distinguish the character of the vehicle. Besides, Brown was totally unarmed. He was no coward but he recognized his limitations.

But there is some comfort to be found in every extremity, and the one reflection which rendered this one endurable to Brown was that Sister Lou lay mercifully unconscious of the situation. He would call a halt now and then, and go back to examine how she did. He found her the last time just as he had left her the first-almost as still as a corpse in reality, her white hands lying pitifully inert by her side, her young face wearing the pallor and repose of death itself. He wondered casually if what his wife had said was true, that her misunderstanding with Lester, and the broken engagement following had brought on this illness. Surely the girl was not so lamely constructed. The idea of allowing a silly love affair to affect one's health.

Brown could not remember that he had ever lost a meal on the subject, but then his wife had sensibly said "yes" when he asked her and they had never dallied about and given themselves trouble quarrelling over foolish differences. When two people suited-Brown rejected the word he had once applied to such compatibility-when two people suited each other as Lester and Sister Lou, why on earth could they not come to a settled determination, and abide by it.

But there was one thing very apparent now, and that was that Lester and Lou had probably had their last quarrel, for if Brown was any had their last quarrel, for it Brown was any judge, the girl in the hearse might as well be there for the last time for all the good any further treatment was going to do her. With this sad reflection Brown adjusted the door so as to admit the air properly and climbed back to his seat in front.

They had reached the most treacherous piece of the road by this time, and with the added difficulties of water and darkness, all his attention was required to direct the cumbersome vehicle in a line of safety. So engrossed were his thoughts upon this purpose that the escaped murderer had dropped entirely from his mind, when of a sudden a voice from the darkness called "Halt!" and a threatening shot rang out into the air. Brown obeyed—in fact under the circumstances it was the easiest thing to do, for the hearse had just run upon a snag somehow and hung fast, and the horses refused to move. "Who comes here?" demanded the same voice approaching.

"Nobody that will be of any service to you," returned Brown peering out into the darkness to locate the criminal. "I have got no money of any consequence and certainly nothing else of any consequence and certainly nothing else you could desire."

"Who said you had? It is you I want. Throw up your hands and advance."

"Well as for throwing up my hands, that is easy enough," acquiesced Brown complacently, "but what earthly good it will do you is more than I can make out. I have got no weapon and you can't see two inches from your nose a night like this." night like this."
"Come forward!" was the impatient com-

"Don't know but you've got the advantage of me there stranger, and had better do the politic act yourself. Here's the old thing hitched up on a stump and she won't budge an inch."

There was a moment's lull in hostilities, during which the man was joined by another, and they both advanced upon the hearse.

"He is either crazy or up a tree," Brown heard the first one remark to his comrade.

"No, I'm not," denied Brown indignantly, "strike a match and see."

"Oh, you don't come any little game like that over us my man. Come down from your perch over us, my man. Come down from your perch and give up. We are going to take you dead or alive."

"Oh, you are, are you? Well maybe you want another corpse along with mine. You can take us both together." With which startcan take us both together." With which start-ling announcement Brown quickly descended from his seat, and taking from his pocket the dry box he had used before that night, struck a match before they realized his intention. As the brief light flashed up revealing himself and the hearse, the two men fell back in extreme astonishment and awe. The discovery was a shocking one. "Why Brown, is it you?" It was the second Why Brown, is it you?" It was the second man who spoke, recovering himself, and there was a familiar ring in the voice which caused Brown to strike another match and stare at him through the circle of light.

"Lester, you idiot! I thought this man the criminal who shot old man Jackson, and yourself his accomplice. What on earth did you take me for?"

"The same, of course. We are out in search

"The same, of course. We are out in search of him. What a terrible mistake! Suppose I had killed you?"

"Well it is no worse than you have probably done already." Brown was thinking of the girl in the hearse and how hopeless she looked. Moreover he had suffered wrong and the weap ns of revenge were at hand. His purpose was formed instantly. For once in his life Brown rose to the level of the dramatic.

"Lester," he said in lower tone, "can you not guess who lies here? There are other weapons as fatal as the pistol shot."

Then the match came into play again, while Brown threw open the door and lit up the interior of the hearse, disclosing the girl Lester loved lying pale and still within.

Nobody ever knew what Lester said. The shock was so unexpected and so far beyond shock was so unexpected and so far beyond what Brown's limited imagination had pictured that for a time he thought the man had lost his reason. But now the redeeming event of his reason. But now the redeeming event of the night's thrilling experience occurred, for Sister Lou, having long since partially recovered consciousness, was roused to a fuller realization of life by hearing her lover's voice proclaiming her name in accents of despairing tenderness. It was a strange but fortunate delusion, however, to which she awoke.

"Yes, dear," she whispered weakly, "I know it was a sad misunderstanding but here in Heaven we shall be happy now—always."

Then she fell backward and slept naturally.

"Well," said Brown, "her idea of Heaven is certainly different from mine, but all the same we won't tell her any better until we get home."

But it was not until many months afterwards, when she was safely enjoying her share of earthly happiness as Mrs. Lester, that he dared reveal the secret of that memorable

SEEN most all kinds of races there is," said - the old man with the grizzled whiskers. "I've seen hoss races, foot races, an yacht races, an' sack races, an' lots of other kinds, but I allow the excitinist one I ever seen was a race betwixt a cinnamon b'ar an' a log house.

"Perhaps it warn't a race exactly in accordance with the rules of the Racin' Association. There warn't no time-keeper, nor no officials at the gates to take tickets. It was a good deal of what they call a 'scrub race', but as I said, it was excitin', an' the stakes was middlin' high, bein' four human critters' lives, each man holdin' his own stake so to speak, an' eventually all of us winnin'-that is, we saved our lives, but nothin' more. In fact, we lost by the sport.

"It was this way. I'd been prospectin' up on the Little Bassamette for a long time without findin' color, an' I'd got kind of tired of proddin' the buzzum of Mother Earth with a pick without any response on her part, so I kind o' settled down nigh the trail an' built a log shack an' planted a little garden, allowin' that some of my feller bein's might come along hungry, an' if they did I could feed 'em, an' if they arrove when I was dry an' they had the means of dispellin' my drought I was so much to the good. Anyways I was livin' there as but just then there happened what the circus happy as Adam in the Garden before Eve came people call the 'most spectacular feature' of the an' begun to holler for a new Easter apron even whole outfit. little while ery little while.

'Well, one day after I'd been there a year or two, three fellers came along and camped down two, three fellers came along and camped down on me, an' they allowed they was prospectin' for gold, too. I told 'em there wasn't gold enough in the county to fill a hen's teeth, but they larfed me to scorn an' allowed they knowed a heap more about gold than I did. Anyways they went out every mornin' with a pick an' a spade, an' a pan an' a flask of amalgam, an' every same mornin' they allowed they'd strike it rich before night; but 'when night come o'er the plain an' moonlight o'er night come o'er the plain an' moonlight o'er the sea,' as we used to sing in Sunday school, they'd allow they hadn't made progress enough to report on.

"Well, they kep' at it for three or four weeks m' weil, they kep at it for three or four weeks an' was just about ready to agree that I was more'n half right, when, lo an' behold you they struck a lead of pay rock not more'n twenty rod from the shack an' as they opened it up it appeared to run right towards the house, an' every blast they put in brought 'em nearer as well as showin' better color as they nearer as well as showin' better color as they proceeded.

"In course that night there was a celebration at the shack, kind of impromptu in its nature, but as spontaneous as spontaneous combustion himself. I happened to think of a demijohn that an Englishman with megaphone clothes an' half a pair of spectacles had left a few months before, an' I added the remainin' contents to the festivities an' after that everything tents to the festivities an' after that everything tents to the festivities an' after that everything 'went as merry as a marriage bell.'

"I hadn't paid no attention to their diggin' an' prospectin', so I didn't know which way the lead run 'til they told me that night, an' they allowed they was goin' to foller right along 'til they struck a big vein, an' they also suggested that there was a possibility that unless there was a change of course in the lead they was follerin' that my log shack would more'n likely be wasted on the desertair. I didn't like that particularly well, because when that house left the surface of the earth I was a homeless wandere an' liable to be took up next time the sheriff come along as a vagrant, which warn't sheriff come along as a vagrant, which warn't sheriff come along as a vagrant, which warn't no particular cause of rejoich'.

"We drank up all the Englishman's booze an' smoked all my tobacker, an' all at once an idea struck me—why couldn't we hist the log shack up an' put it on rollers an' move it up the hill into the thick bush out of the way of blastin', in that way savin' the bother of buildin' a new camp which'd take a heap longer'n to move the old one. The others allowed it was a good scheme, an' we arranged to have a movin' party consisting of ourselves as soon as we got returns from the white settlement where we sent the jug next day with a hurry-up order we sent the jug next day with a hurry-up order tied to the handle. "While we was waitin' for the demijohn, an'

more especially the contents, we fixed a place all ready for the shack about seventy-five or a hundred yards up the hill, an' laid down poles to make a kind of track to roll the mansion up

"In due time we got our liquid encouragement, an' then we moved out all the furniture, consistin' of a barrel of potatoes, a ham, a coffee-pot an' a couple of buckets of nitroglycerine—you see in them days they hadn't begun to mix glycerine with dope an' makin' dynamite an' rendrock an' all those things, but we just used the liquid glycerine an' you bet it was a mighty particular job to handle it too. One of the men took the two buckets over into the timber just beyond where we was goin' to set up housekeepin' agin, an' when he came back we histed the shack up an' put rollers under an' started to 'roll the old chariot along' as one of 'em kep' a singin', an' we got a pretty good move on her when it was suggested that we better tap the demijohn at this stage of the game, an' no one objectin' we proceeded to do "In due time we got our liquid encouragegame, an' no one objectin' we proceeded to do

"As I swung the jug up to my shoulder I piked a bear out of the slant of my lamps a-eatin' out of one of them buckets of giveerine.

It's sweeter'n honey you know an' bears is 'tarnal fond of honey, an' this particular cinnamon seemed to think that a table had been prepared before him in the presence of his enemies.

"I didn't speak out loud, but I called the boys' attention an' with a degree of unanimity seldom equalled an' never excelled we proceeded to evacuate that propinquity, an' of course when we all let go, the house started to trundle back down the hill agin'.

"The cinnamon havin' devoured the glycerine in both buckets an' havin' still a appetite for further sport looked up just as the shack started to roll, an' perhaps havin' an idee that there was more grub aboard, the b'ar started to investigate. Of course, the house kep' agoin' faster 'n' faster an' so did the b'ar, an', after a bit we fellers seen the beast warn't after us, so we turned 'round to see what we should see. we turned 'round to see what we should see we turned 'round to see what we should see.

"Well, what we seen was the shack runnin' down like a train of cars an' the b'ar gainin' every jump, an' after a bit the brute got near enough to make one big jump through the door makin' himself a passenger so to speak,

"Quicker'n a wink after the b'ar secured inside passage for himself the house struck a boulder that interfered with further progress, an' the gait she was goin' gave it considerable of a jolt. The result was that some of the logs in the roof fell down on the bearskinful of in the roof fell down on the bearskinful of nitro glycerine, an' the result was something to make the children lay down their playthings. There was a flash an' a roar like about nineteen thunderstorms an' a earthquake all in one package, an' then the circumambient atmosphere was dark with splinters an' little tufts of hair an' minute chunks of b'ar meat, they warn't recognizable individually as sech, but was inst like dust, but in course we knew but was just like dust, but in course we knew what it was.

"By good fortune I'd kep' the demijohn in my hand when we all started to run, so things warn't so bad as they might have been, al-though in course we had to build a new camp

"How does that put me to the test, Captain Donald Gray?"

"Why, I will know if your love for me is so great, that when you see me dead, feel that I have come to you in spirit form, then will I discover if your words are true, that my death will kill you, Mildred, or whether, after a brief period of mourning you will forget your dead soldier and marry another fellow."

"If I believed you were in earnest, Donald Gray, I could not love you; but let me tell you now, as you are going away, that love with me is my whole existence, and for you to die would mean that I would quickly follow you to the grave. So remember, if your spirit self comes to me I shall take its coming as a warning that you are dead and bid me follow you into the Great Unknown."

"Omens of evil I have no fear of," he answered lightly, and seating herself at the piano she sang the song he had asked for, her voice quivering as she uttered the words:

"And his eyes were fixed upon the cannon's blaze And heavily he drew his breath; For he felt that short were the soldier's days— And dark were the shades of death."

She bowed her head upon her hands and burst into tears as the scene of her double dream swept suddenly before her. A few moments after farewells were said, and Donald a gay party was assembled enjoying in the cool retreat the early days of July.

Of that party of men and women, a few of the former in uniform, "waiting orders" to go to Cuba, where the American army had already landed, the bright particular star was Mildred Carroll, a beauty and an heiress, and a sad co-quette it was said, as she had refused many brilliant offers. for she had confided only to a

She would have refused this particular song, only the one who asked for it was a young officer soon to join his regiment in Cuba, and she yielded, while she had the feeling not to give way to any superstitious dread that would force its way into heart and brain.

She had reached the lines.

She had reached the lines:
"For he felt that short were the soldier's days, when she sprang to her feet with the cry:

"Great God! I saw him fall! There! there he stands before me, and—"?

With a low, pathetic cry she sank upon the floor in a deep swoon. For several days she remained in a deep stupor, to suddenly awaken to perfect consciousness and say distinctly: "He is dead! I saw him fall."
"My child, you are dreaming," said the physician.

Go to my easel there, and look at the painting hidden beneath that silk scarf—yes, that is it, so do not tell me I am in delirium, for that is the scene I beheld, save that I saw Donald fall dead there, a bullet in his heart. You will find it so when the news comes, and those who were near him will recognize the scene, for it was engraven on my heart and brain and I will follow him soon, yes, into the Land of Shades."

several weeks more and a brother officer on sick leave brought home the body of Donald Gray. He told of the thrilling charge up the steep hill, and how nobly Captain Gray had

"I saw him fall and to my dying day I shall never forget that scene." Judge Carroll arose and handed to him an

One of the World's Wonders.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

OVERS of Tom Moore's charming and poetical tale of "Lalla Rookh" will remember his reference to the beautiful "Nourmahal," who "Nourmahal," who o was the "light of the Harem." They may not know that the real "Nourmahal" was the peerlessly beautiful and wonderfully fascinating Mumtaz-i-Mahal, in whose memory her devoted husband, the whose memory her devoted husband, the Shau Jehan, erected more than two hundred years ago a tomb that is to this day looked upon as one of the most beautiful, if not the most beautiful structure in the world. The skill of the architects of later years have not devised or designed anything so beautiful as this great and stately marble tomb on the bank of the Jumna River in far away India.

Shau Jehan was a grandson of the great Akban and his harem contained no woman who could compare with Mumtaz-i-Mahal in beauty of face and form and grace of manner. She possessed all the subtle charm of a Cleonatra and, if history is true, she was a far more beautiful woman than was Cleopatra, whose charm did not lie in remarkable personal beau-charm did not lie in remarkable personal beauty but in a wonderful and compelling fascination of voice and manner.

When death deprived Shau Jehan of his lovely Mumtaz-i-Mahal while she was still young and fair he was inconsolable, and he resolved to erect to her memory the most beautiful tomb in all the world. Possessed of enormous wealth and power he ransacked all India and Asia and other parts of the world for materials for the building that was to eclipse anything the eye of man had seen. Rare marble and precious stones were transported hundreds and thousands of miles in slow moving carayans to the sands of miles in slow moving caravans to the bank of the Jumna. Jewels and all kinds of precious stones were brought from all counnis painting. How am I to understand this, dudge Carroll?"

"My daughter painted it from a scene she day were commanded to put forth their utmost chosen few the secret of her engagement to Captain Donald Gray.

Urged again and again to sing, for she possessed a voice of rarest melody, Mildred yielded and was so obliging that she sang from a plantation skit to a selection from the latest opera, ending with the very ballad that Donald Gray had asked for the day he went away to Cuba.

She would have refused this particular song, only the one who asked for it was a young offiskill Mumtaz-i-Mahal.

Some idea of the tremendous outlay of money and time and labor in the erection of the tomb may be known from the fact that twenty thousand men were employed constantly for a period of twenty-three years in building the splendid tomb. Shau Jehan did not weary of his labor of love in all those years. He was a lover of all that was beautiful in the world of art and nature, and he took infinite delight in watching the splendid building slowly approaching its magnificent completion.

The Taj Mahal, which means "the crowing of Mahal," is in the great garden that was once the pleasure resort of Mumtaz-i-Mahal. This garden is nearly a quarter of a mile square, and it is surrounded by a high wall with an entrance gate that is itself a wonderful piece of architecture, and something worth going far to see. The great tomb itself stands upon a double terrace. The first terrace is of red sandstone with a facing of hewn stone. This terrace is twenty feet high and eight hundred and twenty feet broad. Above it is another terrace of shining marble eighteen feet high and three hundred and thirteen feet square. On this terrace is the tomb of snowy white marble. It is one hundred and eighty-six feet on each side, and from the foot of the first terrace to the graceful ornament on the top of the dome the distance is about two hundred and fifty feet. It is impossible to give any adequate idea of the great beauty of the carvings, the interior decorations and the bewildering beauty of the tomb. decorations and the bewildering beauty of the

An avenue of marble bordered with rare plants and streams of crystal clear water ex-tends from the great entrance gate to the tomb and the surroundings are beautiful beyond description. Tourists who have gone thousands of miles to study this wonderful bit of ancient architecture have felt themselves repaid for their journey, and have come away feeling that the claim that the Taj Mahal was the most beautiful building in the world was a just one.

Shau Jehan survived his beloved wife The Snau Jenan survived his beloved wife for thirty-five years, and when he died he was laid by her side in the great tomb. One may read on his tomb these words: "Defend us from unbelievers." Thousands of unbelievers rom unbelievers. Thousands of unbelievers have visited his tomb and have come away respecting the love and devotion that could inspire the building of such a monument to testify to the love he bore his wife even if they could not believe in his religion.

N Englishman has discovered a way of copying an engraving on a plate from a book without the use of a photographic camera. A cardboard that has been coated with some secret phosphorescent sub-stance is exposed to sun-light for a time and is then placed behind the engrav-ing to be duplicated. A photographic dry plate is placed on the other side, and the book is wrapped in a black cloth. After from fifteen to thirty minutes, varying with the thickness of the paper the plate is developed and a fairly satisfactory negative is the result.

President Arthur Hadley of Yale is a graduate of the class of 1876. He is a young man to stand at the head of a university that has just celebrated its two hundredth birthday. Yale has numbered an army of fifteen thousand in its alumni record. It is interesting to review the history of this great factor in the intellectual life of America. Vale received its charter on the ninth day of October, 1701. Its name was given in honor of Elihu Yale who gave his fortune to the trustees of the infant college. Elihu Yale was born in New Haven during the troublous days of the Indian raids. His father decided to send him to England for safety and at the age of ten the forlorn little lad sailed for England with a Bible and a scant supply of clothes. Eventually he entered the service of the powerful East India company and finally rose to be its president. He never forgot his boyhood home and the fortune he had amassed in England was finally the cause of his name becoming a household word in the home of his youth. Many of the leading names in the political, literary and scientific world of the last two hundred years can be found on the roll of Yale. For four days in October the glories of Yale have been told by the most eminent of her living alumni. The topics were: Yale in its relation to Christian theology and missions by Prof. George P. Fisher; Yale in its relation to law by Thomas Thatcher, while Prof William H. Welch spoke on Yale in its relation to medicine, Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court, Edward Clarence Steadman the poet, and Presidents Northrup and Gilman each spoke of Yale and its great work. The celebration was one of the most interesting anniversaries ever observed in America. Pres. Hadley may well feel proud of the position that he holds and Yale may feel pride in the energy, tact and ability of its young president.

Many millionaires give money to favorite institutions, colleges and philanthropies in which they are interested but few are able or willing to give the time which to them more than to most people means money. Morris K. Jessup has given so liberally of both his time and his money that his pet project, the American Museum of Natural History, is taking rank among the great museums of the world. Mr. Jessup is a native of Connecticut who acquired millions in the banking business of New York. For a time he interested himself in the work of the House of Industry, of the Young Men's Christian Association and in the direction of hospitals. In 1881 he became the President of the Natural History Museum and from then until now the work has grown and broadened through his personal interest. The relics and history of all the Indian tribes of North America have been collected under his direction. Many of the expeditions have been organized and paid for by his generosity. Other wealthy Americans have paid the expenses of similar expeditions to Honduras, to Greenland, and to every country from the Arctic circle to the Antarctic wherever interesting relics of ancient peoples, of animals or of minerals can be found. The scientific value of this work can not be overestimated and it is the personal work of Mr. Jessup that has developed the interest that has made these researches possible.

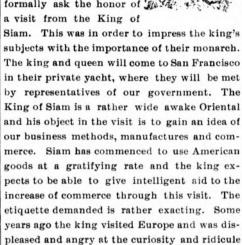

It is a generally accepted idea that literature can not develop in the prosaic soil of a bread winning occupation. Facts however often deny this theory. In spite of this, many people are surprised to learn verse, Austin Dobson, was connected with so practical a body as the English Board of Trade. Mr. Dobson has been in the government employ since 1866. He was but a lad of sixteen when he commenced his never seem to agree, but all his work has been and silk culture. Twenty-two acres devoted granted a tardy pardon.

done under the influence of this unpoetical occupation. Among Mr. Dobson's well-known books are: Vignettes in Rhyme; Proverbs in Porcelain; At the Sign of the Lyre; Carmina Votera. In addition to these books of verse, Mr. Dobson is a well-known magazine writer on various topics and has written a number of prose works. These are mainly biographical. Mr. Dobson retires on a pension. He also receives a pension of two-hundred and fifty pounds granted him by King Edward for distinguished literary services.

The King of Siam is shortly to pay a visit to the United States. His name is as monumental as the crown that figures in a pagoda-like manner in his photographs. It is safe to say that his name will not be treated flippantly for it is Chulalongkorn I. Our consul-general at Bangkok was instructed by his majesty's representatives to request that the United States formally ask the honor of a visit from the King of

Andrew Jackson Cassett is the energetic president of the longest railroad system in the world. The Pennsylvania operates more miles than any other line and it is due to the aggressive policy of Mr. Cassett that it has this distinction. Mr. Cassett has been enjoying a brief vacation abroad. His son is military attache of the American Legation in London, while his sister is recognized as an artist of ability even in Paris, where she makes her home. Mr. Cassett rose to the head of the great railroad system by all the steps of the ladder. He has evinced a most remarkable ability to forecast possible moves on the part of rival lines and to place his own road at the front in spite of all opposition. All in all, Mr. Cassett is a type of the successful business man of large affairs.

The Inter-State and West Indian Exposition which opens at Charleston, South Carolina, in December, promises to be a most interesting exhibition of the resources of the New South. The grounds consist of a beautiful park and a fine old plantation which was turned over to the exposition managers by its owners. A lake of thirty acres has furnished a fine opportunity for landscape gardening. Eleven buildings are grouped around a plaza which is known as the Court of Palaces. The Cotton Palace is the dominating building of the group. The name Old Ivory City is to be applied to the buildings. The electric display will rival that of Buffalo. Twenty states and cities have separate buildings. The states and cities are to reproduce their most famous or historic buildings. Virginia is to reproduce Mount Vernon, New York reproduces Sunnyside, the home of Washington Irving, while many of the southern states reproduce their finest old colonial mansions. Kentucky is to reproduce the beautiexhibit the progress they have made. The return to Egypt, there to live as a private gen-was arrested in Chicago for alleged conspiracy to assassinate the President, is well known both in the United States and Europe. She has a short, strong figure like the Russian peasant type. Her face is pale but waves of color pass over it when she is speaking earnestly. Her brown hair is brushed smoothly a way from a low, broad forehead. Her eyes are dark gray and have all the fire and enthusiasm of the dreamer, the idealist. Her mouth and chin are determined. The whole impression made by her face is that of quiet self control over enthusiasm. It is the type of face found among the women students of Russia. Emma Goldman was born in that country but was educated in Germany. When she was fifteen she returned with her family to St. Petersburg. Her parents were quiet people, content with orthodox ideas. The young woman found companions among the revolutionary students of Russia and this free association and discussion made her an anarchist. At the mention of Russia her face will light up, for she declares that is the only nation where men and women are equal and where mental equality is possible. In her words the Russian woman has the greatest freedom and is the "chum" of her men friends without sentimental side to the friendship other than that which would be held between man and man. Emma Goldman was living with her family in Rochester, New York when the Chicago Anarchists were hung in 1887. This affair confirmed her in her views on the subject of anarchy. Her family had been in fair circumstances but reverses drove Emma Goldman to seek employment in a factory. The hard side of life that she met hardened and embittered her theories and she became prominent as the leader of a strike. Since then she has spoken in many places but always asserts that violence is not the weapon of the anarchist. She declared publicly "If a man came to me and told me he was planning an assassination, I would think him an utter fool and refuse to pay any attention to him. The act is noble but it is mistaken." She also declared that conditions in America had not reached a state that demanded violence. "Anarchy's best future lies in America" declared this woman only last January. She had become a professional nurse although her desire was to be a doctor. Her lectures and violent harangues finally landed her in a prison and after serving her sentence. she went to Europe. She took an advanced course in nursing in Vienna and then proceeded to follow out her political ideas in Paris. A Congress of Anarchists was to be held there but it was prohibited and finally ended in secret meetings. Emma Goldman attempted to give lectures but was finally driven out of France and came back to the United States.

One of the pathetic figures of the drama of history is Arabi Pasha who has recently been pardoned by the English government after years of exile from his native Egypt. At one time he was the central figure in European eyes. He was born on the border of the great and had all the wild spirit of the true son of the desert. When the Egyptian army was reorganized and native officers replaced the foreign ones, Arabi was given a command. In 1881 he led a revolt against the government and became dictator. England interfered and after Alexandria had been bombarded, Arabi and his army fled to Cairo. He was forced to surrender and pleaded guilty to rebellion. He was sentenced to death but the Khedive commuted this decree to perpetual banishment, and he was sent to Ceylon. He seemed old and broken and some time since begged that the English government would allow him to return to Egypt. With trembling voice and broken ful old Federal Hall, a mansion that inspired spirit he said that his eyes were clouded with the song, Old Kentucky Home. # No Pay Until You Know It.

After 2,000 experiments, I have learned how to cure Rheumatism. Not to turn bony joints into flesh again; that is impossible. But I can cure the disease always, at any stage, and forever.

I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal and I will send you an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure, for every druggist keeps it. Use it for a month, and if it does what I claim pay your druggist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't, I will pay him myself.

I have no samples. Any medicine that can affect Rheumatism with but a few doses must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs. It is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that, even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you. I know it and I take this risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 those six bottles pay, and glad out of 40 who ge Lady Sarah Wilson who is now visiting the United States has won much fame through her experiences in the Boer war. She went to the front as war correspondent and figured conspicuously in the siege of Mafeking. She spent the nights in an underground bomb-proof shelter. During the day she acted as nurse and endured all the privations of the soldiers. She was captured by the Boers but exchanged for a woman horse thief that they were anxious to obtain freedom for. It seemed rather ironically amusing that the English lady of title was made a ranking equal in exchange for a horse thief.

USICAL critics often disagree, but it is prob-ably the universal opinion that of all ways of expressing God's melody, after the human voice, comes the violin. Of course by this we mean a good voice and an old violin, and poets, artists and musicians all sing its praises. The exact origin of the violin is unknown—our present instrument is what has from times unrecorded. Mythology dates its birth to the time when the Nile overflowed and left on its banks a dead "cheli" (tortoise). The intense heat of sun dried the flesh and left in the shell nothing but perves and cartillers. and left on its banks a dead "cheli" (tortoise). The intense heat of sun dried the flesh and left in the shell nothing but nerves and cartilage which contracted rendering it sonorous. Orpheus in walking along the shore struck his foot against the shell and was so charmed with the sound that it gave him the idea of the lyre. Consequently the tortoise was a model for sharpe, and the dried sinews of dead animalsfor strings. Hence the origin of hiddles and catgut is classic, as well as picturesque. Orpheus and Apollo are pictured with fiddles, but tracing a bow has been in vain. A century ago at Florence an important discovery was supposed to have been made. A figure of Apollo was found playing on a kind of violin with something of the nature of a bow in his hand. Further investigation, however, proved that this bow had been added to this ancient piece by the hand of a modern restorer of art.

Three-thousand years before our era a king of Ceylon, Rawanon, invented a four stringed instrument played with a bow, but this is only a tradition.

Three-thousand years before our era a king of Ceylon, Rawanon, invented a four stringed instrument played with a bow, but this is only a tradition.

Historically, the early fiddle period shows the instrument being struck or strummed by a plectra, and it was not until the early French period that a bow was used to sustain tones. This instrument was called a Ribee and was pear shape (similar to our guitar) with first two and afterward three strings.

There is no relation between the European and Asiatic fiddle and the instruments of the Chinese and Persians are not considered links in the genealogical fiddle chain.

Germans called their instrument "geige" from the northern word geiga meaning trembling. This term for violin came probably from its association with dancing as it was the instrument used to accompany the dance. An Anglo-Saxon fithele may be seen among other relies in the British Museum; it has four strings and no bridge. It was not until the end of the 15th century that viol manufacture spread through Germany and Italy.

Probably the most ancient viols in existence are those by Hieronymus Brensius of Bologna. There are three of these, which are tables printed in Roman letters. In workmanship they are crude. Gasparo da Sato rejected the early crescent shaped sound holes and originated that which has been in use for three centuries.

All viols about the time of 1520 had pieces of gut tied around the neck and fingerboard to mark the divisions of the scale, but these frets were optional evidently, as many did not have them.

Just where the instruments with four strings

Just where the instruments with four strings tuned in fifths were made is a fact unknown. Brescia, the cradle of violin manufacture, is the town usually associated with its advent. Cremonese makers then came into prominence. They chose their material more for the acoustic properties than for the beauty of the wood, although many are works of art. The violin is made up of fifty-eight separate parts: The back, in one and often two parts, of maple or sycamore; the belly, of the finest quality of Swiss pine; the sides of maple, in six pieces, bent by heated irons; the linings, necessary to secure back and belly to sides, of lime tree or pine, are twelve in number; sound-post, for support, of pine. Probably no two sound-posts were made alike or placed alike. Italians and French call this part of the instrument the soul, Germans called it the voice, and it is, in truth, the nervous system of the violin.

The bridge is made of different qualities of wood. If the instrument has a very brilliant tone it requires a soft wood. If on the contrary it has a mellow sound, it requires wood having solidity of fiber.

The neck was made of sycamore, finger board of ebony, and nut or rest, purfling pegs, blocks, strings, button, and tail piece constitute the remainder of the fifty-eight parts. Strings were frequently made of silk, steel and flax, but animal chords are considered the very best. The varnish forms an important part of the make-up. The best is that the early Italian makers used, but the composition of this Cremonese varnish is unknown. Many have tried known maker though his instruments are destitute of originality. Jacob Stainer was the greatest in his country and he followed the model of Nicollo Amati. So his were not strictly German violins. One story that comes to us concerning Stainer was that he became a Benedictine Monk and in his retirement made the famous "Elector Stainers," but this is inaccurate. Stainer was an apprentice organ builder, but on account of ill health took up the manufacture of violins. He died insane, leaving a widow and eight children.

Francois Medard and Tyrversus were of the early French school and they modeled their instruments after those made at Brescia and Cremona. Boquay and Pierray are the only later makers deserving of praise. Others, in order to produce artificially results obtained only by time, used acids and baked the wood to darken it.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to Comfort PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheel of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carfully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impression before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixalif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

CANADIAN reader says she cannot af-ford to send impressions of her hand and A ford to send impressions of ner hand and comply with the necessary conditions, but would like to get Hargett's Book on Palmistry and asks how much it costs. The book is $2.00, which is just what it costs to have your hand read here, and in the latter case you can pay for the reading by getting subscribers for Comfort. Would it not be better, then, to spend your two dollars here?

O. A. E. M. sends some good impressions of O. A. E. M. sends some good impressions of her hands which are very much lined and seamed, indicating a life full of change and interest. There is a strong life line, which is very much crossed up to the age of thirty-five by other lines which indicate interference in matters of both head and heart. This person is bound down to the wishes of others a great deal in early life, but the latter part of her life will be marked by more independence and judgment. A new influence will first come into the life at about twenty and there will be some serious break in her love affairs at that data which will appear to the life at a source of the life at a s to the life at about twenty and there will be some serious break in her love affairs at that date which will cause her a great deal of grief and pain. She will marry, however, soon after that, the marriage going on happily until about the age of thirty when there will be a break, probably by the death of the husband. The lines are not so distinct as I could wish at this point, and it is possible that she will make up some difficulty with this husband at that time, and in which case the match will last until about the age of fifty. If the first husband dies at this period, however, she will marry again very soon, and in either case she will live much happier after the age of thirty-five than she ever did before. Her fate line is uncommonly strong and clear, although it is crossed by many interfering lines between the age of thirty and fifty. She will always have enough of this world's goods and in old age will be quite wealthy. She will always have enough of the world's goods and in old age will be quite wealthy. She will always be attractive to the opposite sex as long as she lives and will have many admirers. She will be popular in every sense of the word, and have many of the qualities that help to make a public speaker. If she should take to the stage or the public platform, she would be a great success, as she has great magnetism and all the qualities which insure her popularity. She will travel a great deal, although I do not see any long journeys in store for her. She is of a restless disposition and cannot bear to remain quietly in one place. She is ambitious, and her ambitions will be realized in most instances. She will be subject to headaches and nervous affections and in matters of the heart she her ambitions will be realized in most instances. worry lines I will give you the following definition according to Heron-Allen.

"Rays across the hand from the Mount of Venus always denote worries and troubles. Across the line of fortune with a star in the triangle, they denote loss of money; continued to the line of head, a ray indicates a consequent loss of reason, or, at any rate, danger to the mental faculties. Cutting the line of Apollo it betokens a worry or loss of money early in life, by reason of the ruin or misfortune of one's parents; if it starts from a star, it shows that the misfortune was caused by the death of a parent. The age at which these troubles occur is shown by the place at which the line of life is cut by the worry line. If the worry line terminates at a point or star upon the lines of head or heart, or upon the Mount of Mars, it denotes that the worry has brought about an illness. If the line goes straight to the heart, it indicates an unhappy love affair; if an island appear in the line, the consequences are likely to be, or have been, serious, if not shameful. A fork from Mount Venus to the heart line, but not crossing it indicates an unhappy marriage or even a divorce. A worry line from a star in the mount, indicates quarrels with relations, ending in ruin if it goes up to the Mount of Apollo, but if it goes up and joins with the line of Apollo, it is a prognostic of good fortune rising therefrom. A line from the Mount of Venus, just cutting the line of life, indicates marriage at the age whereabout the line is found. Rays across the hand just cutting the line, generally indicate an illness caused by the line whence the ray takes it departure, at the age at which it occurs upon the line; thus, from the Line of Heart it means an illness caused by the heart; from the line of Head an illness caused by the heart; from the line of Head an illness caused by the heart; from the line of Head an illness caused by the heart is means an illness caused by the heart; from the line of Head an illness caused by the heart or brain; from the Mount

Both the subjects indicated above have good mounts of Mercury, indicating intelligence, high spirits, eloquence, industry inventive genius and promptitude in action as well as a love of the occult and a fondness of travel. A high Mount of Mercury will give, with pointed fingers, brilliant oratory; with square fingers, clearness and reason in expounding; with spatulate fingers, force and vehemence in argument and dogma; with long fingers, detail and parentheses; and with short fingers, brevity and conciseness. The great difference between the eloquence of these subjects, and of those whose prevailing mount is that of Apollo, is that the oratory of the former is sophistical and clever, rather than naive and direct like that of the latter; it is this that makes them such good begritters.

How the 'do this so easily has always been a mystery to me, for the bowl is boiling hot to handle. I have got so I can pour for myself, after a fashion, but I always burn my hand in the act, and generally make a drop on the ta-ble.

The bowl holds enough to fill the cup about four times. There is a stimulating, refreshing taste to the liquor drank clear that nothing else has. It is strong, oh, so strong; but I have never found any hurtful results to follow from follow from drinking it, while many a time it has cured for me a headache which threatened to make me helpless for hours. This may be in part because the tea is of a carefully selected brand, because the tea is of a carefully selected brand, but I think it is largely in the making. Students of the art of domestic chemistry tell us that in the five to ten minutes of brewing only the wholesome properties of the tea leaf are set free by the hot water, and the tannin and hurtful elements come after that time, if the water is allowed to stand upon the leaves. is allowed to stand upon the leaves.

BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

OUBTLESS you will think our illustration is a queer one, but according to the London Graphic, the amusement sensation of London the past season was the bicycle performance of Charles Jones on a miniature bicycle track 40 feet in diameter and 5 feet 3 inches in width. The track was set at a level of 60 degrees, and was open towards the stage, presenting the appearance of a slanting park paling. A round the track two performers, Messrs. Jackson and McKay, drove their bicycles at full speed, and then the principal cyclist, Mr. Charles Jones, executed a series of difficult and seemingly dangerous feats upon the track. The effect produced by the cyclists when whirling around is singular, they and their machines being almost parallel with the stage level. To perform in such a position the feats of riding without the use of the hands, standing on one side of the machine, sitting side-saddle and without handle-bars, must be matters requiring great nerve and practice, but they were all performed with ease and safety by this remarkable cyclist. He capped the series by lighting a cigarette and divesting himself of his upper garments while going at full speed and without using his handle-bar. We have had some brilliant feats of cycling skill over here, in the circus ring and on the vaudeville stage, but nothing to equals that.

American manufacturers are shipping wheels to all parts of the world. In France and other foreign countries the riders have developed a fondness for the American machines, which is a strong and fitting indorsement of the quality and stability of American work. Our wheels are much lighter in construction than those of the foreign make, but they are found equally durable as the heavened work our wheels are much lighter in construction than those of the foreign make, but they are found equally durable as the heavened work. OUBTLESS you will think our illustraand stability of American work. Our wheels are much lighter in construction than those of the foreign make, but they are found equally durable as the heavy and more cumbersome types which the foreign manufacturers seem so partial to turning out.

Cycling has been established upon such a firm and permanent basis in this country that it seems likely that another year will see almost every individual who is capable of propelling a machine the owner of a bicycle. And the bicycle following is now growing at such a rapid pace that in the near future the wheel, back the same day furnish good exercise and fresh outlooks.

All sorts of impossible inventions continue All sorts of impossible inventions continue to emanate from the patent office, but the prospect of another radical step forward on present approved lines is obscure. Advancement is not an abstract condition which exists as a natural course, and the improvement of the bicycle cannot be said to cover a century, but was rather confined to two decades. With the public clamoring for prices lower than the cost of a good bicycle, there was a flood of inferior wheels, cheap in all save prices, assembled from a fortuitous medley of unrelated parts and pieces. The sale of assorted parts has decreased, which means that with wheels of established reputation within the reach of all, the profit in home made work is lost.

So give the bicycle its due. It will live though a few immunes deny it the right. It will bear the same relation to the motor bicycle that the horse does to the automobile. Society that the horse does to the automobile. Society will resurrect it as a fad; indeed it may even now be bent upon it since King Edward of England is an enthusiast.

Scorn the scorcher.
Linger not over the laggard.
Let every member of the party be "in form," instead of spoiling it all by attempting great things in an unhardened condition. From forty to fifty miles a day is all that should be attempted, even by those capable of one eightymile day.

Best and shortest are not necessarily synonymous when it comes to routes.

Don't carry much on the handle bars.

Enough luggage for two may be carried in one of the triangular cases which fits into a diamond frame. A woman's wheel is not built that way, so she gets along with as little as possible. If a change of attire is desired at the end of the route it should be expressed in a bag or trunk.

Cycling has now passed its fad period. Some years ago, when every available hall in the big cities was turned into an academy for the instruction of the novice, bicycling received a big boom; in fact, during '97 and '98 nearly every person of high and low degree had a wheel. The approval of society upon cycling enlisted new recruits, and for a season or two all other sports waned. This definite approval by the smart set succeeded in giving a much needed impetus to the cycle pastime and industry, which was responsible for calling widespread attention to the general utility of the needed impetus to the cycle pastime and industry, which was responsible for calling widespread attention to the general utility of the bicycle; and now that the fad element has abandoned its enthusiasm a good, substantial, sport-loving crowd persistently cling to the bicycle for the genuine, healthful enjoyment to be derived from its proper use.

It is less than a half-dozen years ago when the suggestion of women riding bicycles was warmly resented by many; but the gradual and sure spread of the sport and the introduction of good, suitably constructed bicycles for women removed some of the leading obstacles, and this class gradually took to bicycling with as great unconcern, and possibly with as much real enthusiasm, as the men. Since the days of the old high wheels, when the riders of the ordinary type were regarded as "curios" upon the public highways, the manufacturers have been aiming to make the bicycle as perfect a machine as possible, and their efforts in recent years have scored signally, for the type of bicycles on the market this season embraces the best methods of construction and a high degree of finish.

Cycling is robbed of a greet deal of its pleas-

Cycling is robbed of a great deal of its pleasures by riders following daily the same roads and viewing the same surroundings. The pastime becomes a monotonous grind if riders will insist daily on a circuit of the park, a ride through the quiet sections of the city, or the like, when by gaining the city limits and dashing into the suburban territory the real benefit becomes pronounced. It is not essential to participate in tours of long duration to enjoy bicycling. Short trips into the country and

FOR ALL WHO DESIRE IT

Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Mich., Cures So-Called Incurable or Hopeless Cases Through the Wonders of Psychic Science

Dr. Peebles, the grand old man of Battle Creek, in whose brain originated PSYCHIC TREATMENT, has so perfected his method that it has revolutionized the art of healing, and it can almost be said there are no hopeless or incurrable diseases. This system of treatment has brought thousands upon thousands back to health after they had been pronounced hopelessly ill by the best local physicians. His cures have been proclaimed PHENOMENAL by the many thousands who have had a chance to watch the near neighbor, friend or relative pronounced at Death's door by the local doctor, brought back to perfect manhood or womanhood by this eminent doctor and his associates. These wonderful cures are brought about through a system of treatment originated by Dr. Peebles himself, the great authority on Psychic Phenomena, which is a combination of mild magnetic remedies and Psychic Power, making the strongest healing combination known to science. This method has been so perfected by the doctor that anyone may use it in their own home without detention from business or the knowledge of anyone. Mrs. J. W. Anderson, St. Johns, Wash, suffered for years with pain in the ovaries and uterine weakness; she was entirely cured by this treatment. Mrs. C. Harris, of Marionville, Pa, says she cannot express too much gratitude for the results received from Dr. Peebles' treatment for falling of the womb and general exhaustion. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restul sleep every night. G. D. Young of Wimer, Ore. says: "For years I bore about my body the piteous spectacle of disease and death stared me in the face. I now thank heaven I am a well man, and I owe this great victory over disease to Dr. Peebles and his corps of assistants." Mrs. Bell B. Bond, of Dunkirk, N. Y., who was cured of asthma, dropsy, heart trouble and female weakness in a very few months, writes that she recommends Dr. Peebl

DESPAIR NOT, THERE IS STILL HOPE FOR YOU!

No matter what the disease is or how despondent you may feel because you have been told there is no help for you, there is still hope. Hundreds of suffering women have been cured by Dr. Peebles' methods, after being told there was no help for them unless an operation was resorted to. The same may be said of men who are debilitated from excesses and early indiscretions. Indigestion, stomach and bowel troubles, catarrh, liver trouble, rheumatism, kidney trouble, heart trouble, lung and bronchial trouble, dropsy, in fact, any and all diseases yield to this wonderful system. If you are unfamiliar with this treatment, which is annually curing thousands of those pronounced incurable, do not fail to send at once for literature giving full information concerning this grand treatment. It costs nothing whatever, and the information gained will be worth much to you even though you do not take treatment. If you are sick and discouraged do not fail to have the doctors diagnose your case: they will confidentially consider the same, send you at once a complete diagnosis of your condition, and also literature on this grand system of treatment, together with Dr. Peebles' essay, "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease." All this is sent absolutely free. If suffering, write to-day. Address

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: November is here again. The farmer has gathered in his crops and made his preparations for the coming winter, and the busy housewife is planning for Thanksgiving Day; but however much of bustle and life there may be in the air we cannot refrain from a feeling of deep sadness when we remember the excitement which overswept our whole country last November on account of the Presidential elections and our joy when assured that our beloved President McKinley would remain at our head for another four years. Alas! how soon were our hopes frustrated and our joy turned into deepest mourn ing by the dastardly murder of him whom we loved so well and trusted so implicitly! We feel that we have met with an irreparable loss, but we can only echo the dying words of our President "It is the Lord's way. His will be done" and leave it with Him who in his infinite wisdom can cause even this terrible calamity to work for our good.

Our first letter this month comes from our western coast, and from a cousin who has been silent in our circle for many a month, so we welcome gladly his story of the Cliff House, illustrated by his own ready pencil.

ed by his own ready pencil.

"As the shores of California grow clear above the horizon, the traveler on board an ocean steamer nearing San Francisco Bay, finds his attention attracted by a large, castle-like building standing prominently on the verge of the rocky wall bordering the sea. This is the Cliff House, the most famous ocean resort on the Pacific Coast. The course lies quite near to it, as the vessel approaches the Golden Gate, and a fine opportunity is afforded to note its imposing situation, graceful architecture, and the general charm and attractiveness of its surroundings. It is placed on the outermost edge of the ocean's bank, with the surf perpetually dashing upwards at its base; on one side the cliffs stretch in an urbroken line, on the other is a long sweep of sandy beach, and in the background, at a still higher elevation are a finely kept park and gardens, all of which combine in impressing the scene on the observer as one of surpassing beauty.

"The place is several miles from the main part of San Francisco, but is easily reached by the motorlines and boulevards. On favorable days thousands congregate to enjoy the sea breezes, when the glorious sun, amid a blaze of color, sinks to repose in the liquid bosom of the great ocean, he is touched by the beauty and sublimity of the scene, and turns homeward, his heart filled with reverence toward the Great Author of the seas and the Universe."

Now we will go "across the sea" to Venice, and learn a little of lace making in that wonderful old city.

"The tourist in Venice is bewildered with 'the embarrassment of riches.' There is the grand Cathedral of St Mark's, the pathetic Bridge of Sighs, the palace of Desdemona, the buildings rendered famous as having been the homes of great poets, the Brownings, Byron and Goethe, and other points of interest too numerous to mention; but the round of sight seeing would be incomplete if the traveller failed to visit the royal factory where the celebrated Venetian point lace is manufactured and sold.

"As far back as the fifteenth century this lace commenced to be manufactured in Venice, a document of 1493 making mention of it in describing a rich marriage toilet. There are various kinds of point lace,—the Raphael, the Mosaic, the round, the square, the raised, the rose, and the Venetian point or rosaline which is a combination of all the others. These varieties are known as needle point lace, and are the finest that are produced.

"Pillow lace, which is made with bobbins, pins and a pillow or cushion is much easier to make than needle point lace. It can be made very solid and elegant, and is used chiefly for linen and upholstery. This kind of lace is chiefly made in the islands that surround Venice. Its invention is generally credited to the Flemings. In a Flemish picture attributed to Qentin Matsys (1485) introduced a girl working with pillow, bobbins, etc., somewhat similar to those now in use.

"From the infancy of Flemish art, active intercourse was maintained between the low countries and the great centres of Italian art, so it is not strange that the lace making of Venice should have been imitated by the equally industrious and artistic Flemings, and accordingly we find lace making well established in Flanders by the end of the sixteenth century.

"The Venetian 'filet' (net) guipure lace is said to have originated with the fishermen of the Adriatic sea who in repairing their nets showed the artistic taste that characterized all Venetians, and their stitches taken alternately formed a kind of lace which is supposed to have been the foundation of all lace making.

"Colored laces are a specialty in Venice, being made in that city alone. They are made of silk thread, and in rich Persian effects.

Comparatively few of the lace makers work in the factory, much of the work being done in the country around. Visitors are taken into a room where lace makers are at work and it is sad to see how pallid these workers are, and to reflect on the fact that they are wearing away their eye sight and their very life blood in producing these exquisite fabrics. It recalls Hood's pathetic 'song of the shirt'. For remuneration they receive daily a sum equivalent to about twelve cents of our money, and for this pitiful 'mess of pottage' they sell their birthright of health and eyesight. Their paltry earnings, however, are somewhat increased by the little fee which visitors generally give them. The women who show and sell the laces to customers are dressed in black velvet over which they gracefully drape the beautiful fabric, thereby displaying it to the best advantage."

and this time our steps are guided by one who has frequently led us of late into this delightful region.

"Journeying southward from Monterey, down into the luxuriant Carmelo valley, famous for one of the oldest missions in California, one finds what is most rare in this state during the summer time, a deep, clear creek winding and bubbling through the land. For some miles of the devious way leading to this creek the tall pines and oaks grow thickly and when one leaves their cool protection the sunlit view that stretches out before is variable and magnificent.

"Below the road lies the warm valley above and about which the colors of nature are so deep and rich, yet delicate. The sea and sky of Italian beauty, the foliage of brightest hues and the soft coloring of the fine old mission so in keeping with the whole. Near by still stands the old garden of the padres, with its sweet Castilian roses and somber, stately fig trees with their heavy fruit glistening and mellowing in the southern warmth. Farther down the valley flows the green-bordered little Carmelo river, and just beyond its banks is the lane that eventually leads to the creek.

"Passing through the old gate from which vines and shrubs have been cut back all in vain one enters among flowering chestnuts and other sweet smelling trees and vines in such profusion that the atmosphere resembles the warm fragrance of a green-house. Before reaching the creek, however, as though to make one more appreciative of its beauty, one is obliged to leave the green and perfume of the lane for a road about which the trees stand far apart and even the rampant, brilliant lupines seem shy of blooming. This dusty little way is however quickly traversed and before one suddenly appear huge redwoods, the most beautiful of all California's native trees, massive yet fernike in their gracefulness, lofty, yet with drooping boughs bending far downward to the earth. Rising from the damp, shadowy brink of the creek and growing to such immense height that the reflection of their fronds that eventually leads to the creek.

"Assing through the old gate from which vines and shrubs have been cut back all in vain one eners among flowering testunuts and other sweet smelling trees and vines in such profusion that the care and the swirling eddes in search of fish, reappearing from time to time on the crest of some wave to take breath. A giant sea lilion, Ben Butler he was called, made his home and held sway on these rocks for years, until he died during a storm; his body washed ashore, was mounted, and is now on exhibition in a nearby museum with many other creatures and curios of the deep.

"Tourists pronounce the view of beach and sea which is obtained from the Cliff House to be one of the finest in the world. Beautiful it is without doubt; and, when one has drank his fill of the balmy sea breezes, followed with his eyes the grae afful ships fading into the misty distance, listened to the heavy roar of the beating surf, and watched the long lines of rhythmic breakers, rolling showevard, he feels that he could not wish to behold anything more inspiring. And finally, pleasant, peaceful shores, and although they have long been gone from here, some to find rest in the mission churchyard near by, yet there remain many who can tell of the happy hours spent here in the days of long ago."

Our next letter brings with it a strong whiff of the delightful odors of Thanksgiving Day.

OUBTLESS most of you cousins may be found at dinner of you cousins may be found at dinner of your cousins may be found at dinner of your cousins may be found at the property of the poor gobbler whose bone you are picking. So let us now, since Thanksgiving day will be filled with other matters, spend a few moments in investigation into his private life.

"In early springtime, when meadow and upland are yellow with buttercups, and the air is full of nature's song and fragrance, a turkey hen will often be seen to leave the main band and go off by herself, feeding and occasionally uttering a strange calling sound which means to those who understand her that she is either going to her nest or is in search of a place to make one. She will occasionally look back to see if she is followed, and if she finds she is, she will either feed off in a different direction, or go back and join the main band. Her nest is easily found, however, by keeping concealed and watching her closely.

"A turkey hen generally lays one egg every two days. When her nest contains some twelve or fifteen eggs she begins to sit. It requires about twenty-eight days for the eggs to hatch, and then she comes off with as pretty a brood of little brown fowls as ever ran at the calls of a mother. These little birds are very tender for a few days and if exposed to excessive cold or wet weather will drop off like magic. But after they are two or three weeks old they feather out and grow strong.

"The turkey, unlike most domestic fowls, is of a roving disposition, and when the little birds are strong enough to endure a day's journey it is better to let the old hen out where she can roam at will. Then it is a sight to see the little ones follow her, for they are constantly as busy as bees, running here and there in search of a bug or young grasshopper and never seeming to grow tired.

"As a mother the turkey hen is very shrewd. She will always take her little flock t Here is an amusing incident of the World's Fai written by a new contributor.

"I was always much interested in the Turks, so when I went to the 'World's Fair' at Chicago I was on the lookout for these, to me, terrible people. I saw them many times on the grounds, and well might any one dread their anger. But the one whom I saw from my hotel window made me sure that I would always give a native Turk a wide berth.

"One day, while resting from sight-seeing, I felt like the little boy at the circus when they told him

"I came to see, and I am going to see!"

"So I sat watching the world and his wife pour past my window, when along came an old Irish woman and her boy 'a wearin' of the green' and in Irish holiday attire, and, like myself, they were trying to make one pair of eyes see as much as ten. All at once their gaze fell on something up street. My eyes followed theirs and I beheld Mr. Turk, petticoat, big knife and all; and a huge Turk he was. My little Irish couple stood stock still and gazed with wide eyes and open mouths.

"Now Mr. Turk did not like to be stared at, so he got angry 'and in a voice like thunder he scolded them; he ranted around them, and brandished his knife over them, while they shook as if they had the ague. Finally he moved on, but they did not stir until he was out of sight; then they seized hands and ran as though they feared he was pursuing them.

"And I, well, I had been scared, but after the

"When visiting the quaint old city of Williamsburg, one is struck with its antique appearance and historic reminiscences of early days. Next to the college, the glory of Williamsburg is Bruton church, and a brief history of its infancy would perhaps be interesting.

"Bruton Parish sprung from several successive parishes. When, in 1632, Middle Plantation, subsequently Williamsburg, was laid out, a parish church of the same name was erected. Horlop parish later united with this as Middletown parish. In 1674 Middletown was joined to Marston, and the united parishes became known as Bruton Parish—which name has ever since been retained. In 1677, the vestry determined not to repair the upper or lower churches in the parish, but to build a new brick church at Middle Plantation. An agreement was signed to build the brick church 'for £150 and of tobacco or £5, payable to the minister; for burial in church 50 pounds of tobacco, payable to the parish; for funeral sermon £2, payable to he minister; for registering christenings and burials, 2 pounds of tobacco each, payable to the clerk of the parish; for digging a grave 10 pounds of tobacco, payable to the sexton. The minister's salary was fixed at 1,600 pounds of tobacco and cash annually.

bacco, payable to the sexton. The minister's salary was fixed at 1,600 pounds of tobacco and cash annually.

"The establishment of the college in 1693 and the removal hither of the capitol in 1694 affected the church, and a new one was built, about 1715, to hold the congregation, in shape almost an even cross. The pulpit was at the southeast corner, and was reached by a flight of winding stairs. The chancel was at the east end. The pews were rectangular, and the pew of the governor was near the pulpit, and had a canopy over it. White-washed walls, oil painted manogany seats, and stone-flagged aisles were features of Bruton in common with other churches of that period. The present brick wall was built in 1752. New repairs were ordered in 1769, and the church altered to its present proportions. An organ, undoubtedly the first church organ in the United States, was secured and placed in the loft. Since 1837, the high pews and stone-paved aisles and pulpit and chancel have passed away. Modern improvements have changed the interior, which now presents a very beautiful appearance.

In the churchyard sleep many who were well known in their day.

It may be well to notice that in this church is a baptismal font taken from the church at Jamestown, and claimed to be the first of its kind in this country, it having been brought over to America by Smith and Hunt. The ancient clock, whose hands have long ceased to toil, looks down from the steeple from which the tuneful notes of the old bell may yet be heard, calling the people forth for worship."

Sir Thomas Lipton did not have much fear of the hoodoo of a name when he named his yacht Shamrock second.

Dooley declared that the best way to end the Boer war was to say it was ended. Recent events lead to an appreciation that this may be the only way.

Since the first of last June $15,974,872 has been given to the colleges of this nation. Let us be thankful that Americans show their belief in education in such a practical manner.

The old Puritan Thanksgiving is still the great home festival. Our ill luck, our miseries, our misfortunes are always too evident. It is well that we set aside one day in which it is our duty to search for something pleasant, something to be thankful for. The American home is the grandest place on earth and it is natural to turn in that direction when the call goes forth to return thanks.

It is claimed by some observers that the telephone and the trolley car are the electrical agents that are scattering the population of the cities into the country. Not that we have grown to love Nature. No, we have loved her all the while, but the benefits of the city were too evident and isolation was too high a price to pay for space and pure air. Electricity has changed the condition and people have returned to the country.

The Sultan must feel that these are new times. He can hark back not so many years when his policy kept all Europe guessing and when no one called him to account for the harassing of Greece. Now he is obliged to pay the hustling Yankees indemnity and after a startling bluff at France and rumors of a general European imbroglio, the poor old Turk is forced to back out. The "unspeakable Turk" is becoming able to understand the voice of command.

Germany has again raised the tariff on breadstuffs imported from the United States. She has not raised enough grains this year for home consumption and as a result the price of bread bears heavily upon the poorer classes. It was the same condition that brought on the "Corn Law" agitation in England some years ago. The fierce fight against a tax upon food finally resulted in a better feeling against tariff laws in general and resulted in England's becoming practically a free trade country. Germany is next to the United States one of the highest "protective tariff" nations of the world but she needs to watch the effect of hunger upon her policy of taxing necessities as well as luxuries.

Norway extends the suffrage to women. This became a law in October and now all tax paying women have the right to vote at city elections. In many ways the people of Norway enjoy a right in directing their own affairs. Men were not allowed universal suffrage in cities until a recent date. At first the voting was limited to tax payers. The suffragists of America are much encouraged because President Roosevelt is on record as favoring woman suffrage when he was governor of New York. Calm observers of the current of events believe that universal suffrage for women is one of the lines in which the new century will develop. The believers in woman suffrage hail an event like that in Norway as a great victory but the unprejudiced observer feels that it is only another indication of the inevitable tendency of

For what gift or blessing should we be most thankful? Each will answer the question in his own way and according to his own personality and environment. An American millionaire whose name is a power both at home and abroad gave a greeting that carried in its kindly wish much material for thought. He gave his picture to a charming young married couple blessed with abundant vitality, enthusiam and joy in life but with no superfluity of worldly wealth. Across the face of the of worldly wealth. Across the lace of the photo, were the words "Wishing you health and happiness". These two words compass the good of this life that money can not purchase. "Health" and "Happiness" and if you have the first it is not so difficult to achieve the last. The words meant so much between, above and around the lines. It was the best thing that the man of millions could wish for his friends and the two little words hold the entire circle of blessings that make life worth while.

America seems to have developed a perfect epidemic of anniversary and exposition occasions. We seem to be intoxicated at the fact that our history has grown to such length of years that we can have centennials, bicentennials and countless fifty year celebrations and can indulge in the grown up luxury of looking backward. Side by side with this pride in the past is our commercial instinct to enliven the resurrection with all the wonderful advance shown by our material progress. England has just finished her celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the death of King Alfred the Great. A real millenium occasion does make our little jubilees seem extremely modern and "to-day-ish". Canada has become inoculated with our exposition habit and is discussing the plan of holding a Pan-British Exposition at Toronto. This is to show the advance of the provinces of Canada and also that of all the colonies under the English flag. The colonies of England are almost as young as the United States and such an exposition would furnish an excellent means of comparison of progress between the rebellious daughter and the more dutiful children. America seems to have developed a perfect

Many attempts have been made by our government and by private individuals to preserve the sites and scenes that mark events in our history. Although a society has been organized and the matter brought before Conour history. Although a society has been organized and the matter brought before Congress, no effective measures have been taken to preserve the oldest historical ground in our country—Ticonderoga and Crown Point. At both these places are heaps of ruins where once stood the two greatest forts of the continent. Before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock, Samuel de Champlain had fought a great battle with the Iroquois at Ticonderoga. In 1609, no history had been made in America except the little settlement at Jamestown. Around Ticonderoga clustered all the romance of French settlement. That fort and old Fort Frederick at Crown Point were strongholds of the French until 1758. During the Revolution the stirring scenes of Burgoyne's campaign were enacted at Ticonderoga and Ethan Allen and his Green Mountain Boys made themselves immortal by their capture of the old stronghold, "In the name God and the Continental Congress." The scene of all these stirring memories is at the mercy of any vandal who cares to cart away the stone and the ruins have lost much of their beauty by such acts. The purchase by the government and the establishment of a state park would preserve the most historic spot in America from further desecration. The state of New York would do well to acquire the property even if the nation did not, for it is ground around which all that is most romantic in New York history has been enacted as well as deeds of the greatest heroism. as deeds of the greatest heroism.

Thanksgiving Day comes to the people of America in this November with a peculiar sadness and also a feeling of real thankfulness and hope. The sad event that threw the nations of the world into mourning is too near to be forgotten or to have lost its grief. The national calamity saddens all causes for personal individual joy in a season of thankfulness. It has been a year of great and unbounded prosperity to the individual. "God bless all our gains" say we, but 'God bless all our losses" better suits with our degrees. God can bless this loss of its loved and honored chief to the American people. We may find that reckless license of speech and press is not liberty. The American press may learn the lesson that no belittling or lack of personal respect to the head of our nation can help political ends. Both parties need to learn this lesson by heart. We may learn that all defiance of organized lawful authority and law is anarchy. Our three thousand cases of lynching during the last few years do not show a high moral sense of the majesty of the law. If it needed the death of a man loved by the people at the supposed instigation of anarchy to create a respect for the man loved by the people at the supposed instigation of anarchy to create a respect for the forms of law, no victim of lesser degree could have so far enforced it. The shock has set the nation to thinking. We may have a feeling of thankfulness that our great martyr shall not have died in vain if these ends are reached. It is a heavy price to pay and such knowledge is dearly bought, but the American people may feel thankful that there are evidences that the knowledge has been gained. knowledge has been gained.

The nations of Europe have watched the colonial expansion of the United States with an observing and a jealous eye. No voice was raised to demand that the converse of the Monroe Doctrine should be observed and that if we insisted that European nations should not colonize or control America we should observe the same spirit toward the old world. This discussion began, however, when the United States sent a war vessel on the outbreak of the Venezuelan-Columbian dispute. With great uniformity, the European papers have read in that act a desire on our part to finally absorb all of South America. This is imperialism come home to roost. The same papers declare that it will be impossible for the nations of Europe to conform to any such political ideas, and that the United States will have to sacrifice Saint Monroe ou the altar of our overwhelming desire to rule. It is strange at this late date to find the purpose of the United States so misunderstood. We gave a clear demonstration in China that the motives of the roe Doctrine should be observed and that if we onstration in China that the motives of the United States could be and were disinterested.

Germany has protested most bitterly against our assuming any big-brotherly against our assuming any big-brotherly attitude in South America. The United States should exercise an arbitratorship over South American affairs. They are too near us in South America for us to be indifferent as to results. The South American republic owe their chance to obtain liberty to the power of the United States that said "Stand off" to the harpies of Europe who were anxious to join the battle. It is not for them now to dictate a course to us, especially when that course has long been a matter of understood policy. derstood policy.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE following letter on pecan culture comes from a reader in Savannah, Georgia, and I am sure will be read with much in-terest by those living in parts of the country where nuts can be successfully cultivasuccessfully cultivated:

"A few years ago while yet quite a young man, almost the first thing I did for myself when starting in life was to obtain the first thing I did for myself when starting in life was to obtain the finest pecan known and set an orchard. I obtain that were far superior to any obtained from elsewhere, the large size, fine quality and thin shell being considered, also they were from isolated trees, so they were certain to reproduce themselves.

"I planted the nuts in the spring, soaking them in chemicals in order to get them to germinate quickly, as I knew thin shell nuts would not stand being water-soaked all winter and germinate. When the trees were one year old I transplanted them, previously analyzing the ashes of pecan wood to see what fertilizer they needed, and found potash was what it craved and by experimenting found the common potash such as soap is made from was best and cheapest. I use one pound potash and ten gallons water—use one gallon in setting the tree and the same quality the following season, making holes with iron rods and pouring in the water.

"Some of the trees bore at four years. All at Pecans will grow wherever a common hick-ory will thrive. Ten acres is a fortune here fortune here and one to have not affected by any disease or pests and safer than a bank ac-count or insurance policy. The pecan makes a beautiful shade for lawn also." We have letters re questing further recipesand suggestions for the care of the hair.

The white of egg, though excellent for cleaning the hair, tends to darken it. For blonds it is better to use borax and warm water, in the proportion of one teaspoon borax to a cup of water. Rub it into the roots of the hair with a circumfactory and its set. proportion of the proportion of the hair with a piece of flannel until every particle of dandruff has been removed. Then dry thoroughly, allowing it to hang loose for an hour or two. The next day, rinse with warm water and then with cold and again dry thoroughly and comb with a coarse comb.

and adding a lump of camphor, and if the hair is inclined to be dry, a teaspoon of cocoanut or olive oil.

Ammonia should be omitted from any recipe if the scalp is very dry. During the hot weather many people suffer from loss of hair, due to overheated heads which weaken the scalp. If this occurs, use the following hair wash every morning for a fortnight, and then three times a week.

One ounce each of oil of sweet almonds, spirits chloroform, laurel water and spirits semary. Mix carefully and put into roots of Often after severe illness, or when one has been "out of sorts" for a lengthened period, one's hair is apt to come out in handfuls, and get thin with alarming rapidity. In cases such as these there is usually but one thing to be done, if a permanent cure is to be obtained, and that is to have the hair cut quite short, and to keep it so for a year or two, using, meanwhile, with scrupulous regularity, some tonic lotion, and adding, if possible, the occasional stimulus of electricity. This "electric" treatment can be administered by one's maid or one'sself; or, if the hire or purchase of a proper battery is impossible, usually every first-class hairdresser nowadays has the necessary apparatus for the purpose. atus for the purpose.

Friction, either by hand or brush, is also an excellent accessory means when the hair has been cut; and strong rosemary tea, or a very diluted solution of the essential oils of rosemary or thyme, is often advantageous as facilitating friction. A very good friction wash can be made by the addition of a little pure spirit of wine or good rum to the rosemary or thyme oil.

mon potash such as soap is made from was best and cheapest. I use one pound potash and ten gallons water—use one gallon in setting the tree and the same quality the following season, making holes with iron rods and pouring in the water.

"Some of the trees bore at four years. All at five or six and at nine years bore as much as two hundred and seventy-five pounds per tree. The finest nuts you ever saw, about twenty-five nuts to pound and when you consider that it takes one hundred and when you consider that it takes one will be to the many and try to prevent the mischief spreading further by a proper system of medical and hygienic treatment, rather than to fly to dyes as a means of concealment. But a simple and often very efficacious "darkener" is provided by mixing a teaspoon to a teacup of Condy's fluid in soft water. Applied with a sponge thoroughly, it will generally be found to darken the hair very considerably.

of bleaching dyes is per-oxide of oxide of hydrogen. The simple peroxide can be obained at almost any druggist's. The use of this will gradually gradually lighten the tint of the hair, until it becomes a pale flaxen. But it is only right that I t h a t I should warn my readers that if its use is per-sisted in till this result is attained, considerable injury to the hair may result by impairing its tex-ture; it will also cause it

Few people realize that the hair needs as careful attention as the face.

A soft bristle brush and a coarse comb are the only implements to use on the hair. Never use a fine-tooth comb as it irritates the scalp. Keep the head clean by shampooing.

The growth of hair in a healthy scalp is eight inches a year. If one uses curling irons daily, especially in the summer, some nourishment should be supplied. A good recipe is one ounce each of lavender water and glycerine, two ounces clarified honey and four ounces two ounces clarified honey and four ounces rectified spirit. Mix the honey and glycerine together, then add the lavender water or cologne, and last the spirit.

A recipe which gives a glossy appearance to the hair, as well as strengthens it, is: Two drams castor oil, five ounces rectified spirit, a little attar of rose and two drams cochineal tincture. Put a few drops into the palm of the hand and then rub the bristles of the brush across it and so apply to the hair.

Before applying the peroxide, the hair must be thoroughly washed in hot water, containing a small quantity of borax, soda, or ammonia, so that it may be entirely freed from grease or dirt. Unless this be done, the bleaching fluid will produce little or no effect.

The morning is the best, and, indeed, the proper time for applying the wash, as the action of light, more especially that of sunlight, is very helpful.

Three or four applications will generally be found sufficient to give the desired hue to the hair, and then the operation need not be repeated, as a general rule, for a month or even six weeks. Then the same course of treatment, cleaning the hair, and so forth, must be gone

The list of Mr. Rockefeller's benefactions would indeed fill a large volume. He is a giver in every kind of charity, public and private. "Always reticent about his gifts, it is impossible to learn exactly how much he has given, or to what purpose." About five years ago he presented Vassar College with $100,000,—a like sum to the Rochester University and the same to Spelman at Augusta in honor of his wife's family. Says a recent writer who knows his family well and has spent days in his charming home circle: "Mr. Rockefeller's private charities have been almost numberless. He has aided young men and women through college, ed young men and women through college, sometimes by gift and sometimes by loan. Neither the farmer nor shopkeeper sells the same customer twice if he was dishonest in making the first sale. "Mr. Rockefeller is a deeply religious man," remarks a recent writer, "and he has made his gifts as an obligation of religious duty as it seems to him." Their religious significance, however, in this particular instance, does not in any degree impair their value. institution for the education of both sexes, and through wise administration as well as its remarkable endowment, is already third in attendance of our great universities. It opened its doors to students on October 1, 1892. The youngest of American universities has been fortunate in other endowments from public spirited men of the west also, and possesses in the Yerkes telescope the largest instrument for astronomical observations in the world.

Mr. Rockefeller's first gift to the Chicago College was the round sum of $600,000, in 1889, conditioned on the pledging of $400,000 by others before June 1, 1890. In September, 1890, seeing that the conditions had been fulfilled, the Standard Oil magnate placed another million dollars at the disposal of the foundation. In February, 1892, he gave one million dollars in five per cent. bonds of this government, and in December of the same year another million of the same variety—two millions in one year! His giving of millions has stimulated the giving of other millions, in one instance an entire million from one source. The building and endowment of the University of Chicago seems like a dream of wealth. But it is a day of great things and the motto of the founder of our great enterprises is "to-day, not to-morrow." Thus an institution which is third in size among the great universities of the world, and in certain particulars of equipment is first, has sprung into being in less than a decade at the bidding of one man.

The habits inculcated during this experience The habits inculcated during this experience of three years' industry, energy and economy, enabled the future oil magnate to start in business on his own account before he was nineteen years of age. He had by this time saved nearly a thousand dollars. His father loaned him a thousand more at ten per cent. interest which was not high in those days even to a son and he formed a partnership in the produce commission business, the firm being Clark & Rockefeller. It is recorded that he worked early and late and that his spare moments were Rockefeller. It is recorded that he worked early and late and that his spare moments were spent wholly in church work and charity. "There was always some person in sickness or sorrow to be visited, some child to be brought into the Sunday school, or some stranger to be invited to the prayer-meetings."

Young Rockefeller's shrewd sense and rare business ability were gradually concentrated on the wonderful new illuminating product, original and improved methods of refining were developed, and in 1865 he sold out his interest in the commission house, and bought Bradford, November 19, 1621.

In a book entitled "Old New England" there is an account of a Thanksgiving service held at Monhegan, by the Popham Colonists, on August 7th, 1621, giving thanks for their safe arrival on the shores of the new Continent. Very little is known concerning that event, and the general sentiment which centers around the celebration of the day, seems to of the day, seems to have its origin in the observation of Thanksgiving by our Pilgrim forefathers of Ply-

There are those who assert that the great celebration of 1621 was not the first Thanks-giving observed by the Plymouth Colony, but that the first really took place when they observed a day of prayer before deciding, in a formal way, and as a body, that Plymouth should be the point of settlement for their new homes. In this service, held by appointment, they were to give thanks for their safe arrival, and deliverance from perils of sea and land, and also "For the birth of the son, born to Susannah White, Dec. 19th, 1620, at six o'clock in the morning."

their variety. In the drawing rooms nothing is more effective than Indian corn and diminutive yellow pumpkins, the corn with its long stalks and golden ears stacked on either side of the wide doors or grouped in corners, the small pumpkins with more ears of corn piled at the base. If the red pop corn is procurable it is handsomer still, being so rich in color and blending so artistically with the harvest tints. Vines of cranberry crowded with the tiny red globes can trail across mantel shelves or twine up and down columns, while garlands of red and green peppers, all sizes and shapes and great bunches of ripe wheat and oats or other grain are picturesque in coloring and effect. Dried grasses and cattails, too, add a touch of nature, and boughs of red or russet leaves. Fruits of all kinds—grapes, late pears and peaches, rosy apples and purple plums, mingled with their own foliage are unique and highly typical of the harvest home.

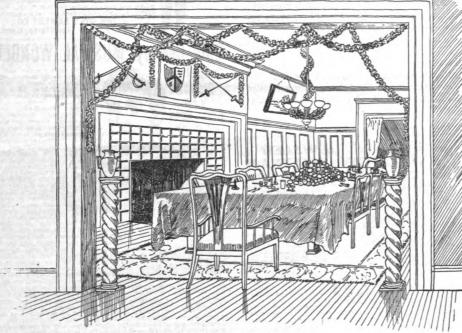

The dinner table is the center of attraction on this day of peace and plenty, and the more enticing it appears the greater success does the housewife feel she has achieved. One cannot fancy what a novel scheme of table decoration may be obtained by a homely method of vegetable design, unless she has seen or tried the plan. This is accomplished by cutting the ordinary "garden truck" into shapes simulating flowers—from the beet a deep red rose; from the yellow turnip, a tiger lily; a white lily or chrysanthemum from the potato with lettuce leaves for foliage, while cabbage, celery, cauliflower and the dozen other kitchen garden products add blossoms to this original bouquet. One of these ornaments serves at each plate as a favor, while a huge group mixed with fruits form a fine centerpiece.

To complete the table arrangement, individual candles are to be placed at each plate, the idea can be carried out by having the candle the color of the vegetable blossom and the shade a corresponding flower; for instance a beet carved to represent a red rose would need a red candle and a shade, a chrysanthemum from a potato would take a white candle and white chrysanthemum as shade. These shades can be bought or can be fashioned at home from crepe paper or silk, if one is accustomed to being "handy" with her hands. FOR THE THANKSGIVING FEAST.

during the winter only seven of their number were well enough to care for the living and bury the dead. When spring came, the diminished band, weak and ill, and sorrowing over the death of loved ones, pluckily began to cultivate their lands.

When fall came and they began to gather in their crops, and make ready their homes for the second winter in the new world, Governor Bradford proclaimed a season of general feasting and thanksgiving, and sent a messenger to invite Massasoit, the friendly Indian chief, and his warriors to celebrate with them. This celebration lasted three days, beginning on Thursday, but the dinner of all, the regular Thanksgiving-dinner was served on Saturday, and no dinner of the present day will out-rank it as regards the quality, quantity, or variety of the foods served. The Indians brought with them as an offering of friendship a supply of fine oysters—which by the way made a new dish for the Colonists—and several fat deer. Men of the colony went out gunning and brought in an abundant supply of wild turkeys. It is not probable that the Pilgrim Fathers and "Mothers" did much in the way of decorating their homes for the occasion as that, would have been scarcely in keeping with the simple Puritan living of those early days, when the Plymouth Colony folk sought godliness in all things, rigidly foreswearing the frivolities of this mundane sphere. But the present generation has grown more lenient as civilization has marched onward, it being no longer a matter reprehensible to take pleasure in the things of beauty that delight the eye.

Today the only question arising in the mind of the feminine householder is what she can devise in the way of decoration that will lend a touch or novelty to the embellishment of her rooms and table when the family circle assembles to give thanks for the blessings that life holds for every one in a greater or less degree.

Chrysanthemums have come to be regarded Chrysanthemums have come to be regarded as the most appropriate and ornamental flower of the late autumn, especially the gorgeous varieties now produced, but nothing seems quite so much in accord with the spirit of the day as the product of the harvest fields in all

If games and dancing for the young people follow dinner, the favors must partake of a Thanksgiving flavor as well, prim little caps and kerchiefs for the girls, long pipes and big shoe buckles for the youths, or samplers and miniature spinning wheels, and old-fashioned mugs and tankards of pewter. The old-time games always create much merriment, blindman's buff, hunt the slipper, "Oats, peas, beans and barley grows", "Little Sally Waters", "London Bridge", but none is quite so thoroughly characteristic as "Snap dragon" when the lights are turned out and the alcohol lighted on the big tray or platter placed in the centre of the dining room table, while all snatch out the nuts and raisins from the burning fluid, never minding if one's fingers do get a little scorching. The one who manages to pick out the most goodies is the prize winner. Then when all these have been appropriated a small handful of salt thrown on the burning alcohol produces a blue flame and a ghastly hue on all the faces causing a general shout of laughter as the different expressions are noted. T is a fact worthy of note that some of the most popular books of last year were written by men living in the west. It is also worthy of note that the writers note that the writers of these books, with the exception of Mr. Maurice Thompson, are newcomers to the field of literature. Each year the west adds a very creditable number of more than merely credita-

Each year the west adds a very creditable number of more than merely creditable nowledge of more than merely creditable books to o ur American literature. If one will take the trouble to inform one's self regarding the books that are called for most at the public libraries, one will find that there is a speedy and growing demand for "The Redemption of David Corson," by Charles Frederick Goss. One does not read many pages of the book before discovering that here is a book written by a master hand, and that it is a book of more than ordinary import. One is not much surprised to know that the author of the book is a minister. He is a pastor of a church in Cincinnati, Ohio, and he was for some time pastor of the Chicago Avenue Baptist Church in Chicago. While "The Redemption of David Corson" is a religious novel it is not in any sense an attempt to settle any of the religious or theological questions of the day. It has the higher and better motive of showing the redeeming power of the gospel, and this it has done in a way that has won for the book the strong commendation of such men as the Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, who, when he had finished reading the book, telegraphed to the author: "I have just finished reading "The Redemption of David Corson' with wet eyes and a leaping heart." Another noted divine, the Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulas, wrote of the book: "The author has told a story in which the fact of sin is illuminated with the utmost truthfulness, and the fact of redemption is portrayed with the utmost power. There are small things, as to literary style and the suddenness of some turns in the current of events, might be said, but no one can read the book without knowing that he is in the hands of a masterly and sympathetic minister to human souls. There are lines of greatness in the book without knowing that he is in the hands of a masterly and sympathetic minister to human souls. There are lines of greatness in the book which I shall never forget."

Many readers of the book may not know that Edward Caskoden is really Mr. Charles Major, of Shelbyville, Indiana. He may properly be called a young writer as he is not quite forty-five years of age and the best of his the best of his working years are before him. of the day. It is a thrilling romance of American life based upon some of the most striking and thrilling facts in our American history. It is a story of love and patriotism in the revolutionary days in the Wabash Valley. The scene is laid at Old Vincennes where Fort Sackville was first occupied by the Americans under Captain Helm, was captured by the British under Governor Hamilton of Detroit, and was finally recaptured by Colonel Clarke after a terrible march from Kaskaskia. These men play important parts in the book, but Alice, the adopted daughter of Papa Roussillon, and her lover are two of the most delightful characters in the volume which is one of great power and beauty.

One of the most common errors among piano students is to think it is easier to learn a piece superficially than to do so thoroughly and well. It comes about largely by a system of shirking systematic practice and the necessary amount of hard labor to overcome the difficulties in the systematic practice and the necessary amount of hard labor to overcome the difficulties in the way. If the student commences musical work with disinclination to take sufficient pains to thoroughly master the work, the habit will continually grow until it becomes a second nature to turn out half-finished and slovenly work, and nothing will show the accomplishment which can only come with plodding, painstaking concentration and intention to understand every part.

Therefore every student should endeavor to start in at the beginning by taking pains, even if progress be more slow. If this course be pursued the student will not be continually going back to remedy defects, for every part of the structure from foundation upward will be strong and substantial. While hurried and careless ways of study bring the result of easy discouragement before difficulties, or a willingness to be satisfied with playing that is full of faults caused by lack of thorough practice.

Those who are interested in vocal or instrumental music will find a valuable offer of the latest and most catchy sheet music on another page. The cost is so trifling that after sending for a trial lot all musicians continue ordering constantly. If not interested yourself call the attention of the musical member of your family to it.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

NDER "the roof of the world" lies a little country subject to Britain's rule; where probably more people exist (for some do no more than that) than in any other given space in the Orient, and by hundreds of thouby hundreds of thou-sands, more than can be counted in the same amount of territory in be counted in the same amount of territory in the west.

The land is infested with all sorts of reptiles and vermin, but that there is "good in everything" we see demonstrated by the snake charmer of Ludia who crones his song or blows his siren whistle for the edification of the foreigner who pays to see this exhibition of—well—mind over matter—in the performance. These shows go on from morning until night just outside hotel doors, in fact in every convenient corner. In this connection it is horrible to realize the fact that in 1892 over 19,000 people died in Ludia as a result of snake bites. Rewards were offered by the government for their destruction but the money was such a temptation to the poor natives, that they went into the business of breeding snakes for the rewards. went into the business of breeding snakes for

There is no greater blessing to these poor people than the palm trees whose sap makes sugar, the ripe fruit solid food and the green fruit milk. From the kernel they obtain a rich oil used for light. The fibre of the nut is converted into clothing, fish-nets and sails. From the bark ropes and matting are manufactured and lest of all the leaves me ketheskets. tred and last of all the leaves m ke baskets, hats and our indispensable palm leaf fans. followers of Mohammed being the largest in numbers. Hindus and Buddhists also control a large share.

An interesting though small sect is the Pharsees, who, like the Jews in our own country, in many places control the finances. In the city of Bombay some of the richest schools, hospitals, and fountains have been contributed by the wealthy Pharsees. This sect differs in all respects from the Hindu or Mohammedan. They are followers of Zoroaster the Persian Prophet. They are earnest believers in one God whose symbol is the sun, without which our little earth would be a cold dead mass. The intensity and brilliancy makes it impossible to worship the sun directly, so they substitute fire. From this fact they have been termed "fire-worshipers". The purity of their religion is obvious compared with the idolatry of the east. The Pharsee temple contains no ornament or idol, only the altar on which burns the sacred fire which, it is claimed, has never been extinguished since it was brought hither by the exiled Persians centuries ago. In the Pharsee cemetery at Bombay are the celebrated "Towers of Silence" within which is a curving wall surmounted by living vultures awaiting their prey. The funeral procession conveys the body through and within this wall where a few prayers are said by the priest who removes the covering from the body, and almost before the mourners are out of hearing these birds swoop down and devour the flesh leaving only the skeleton. This belief that it is far more beautiful to consign a body to the birds of the air, than to bury it, is an open question.

Buddhism is the predominating religion of Ceylon. Here, in the temple of the "Sacred tooth" is supposed to lie in state the left eye tooth of Budda taken from his ashes over two thousand years ago and conveyed to this sanctuary. It is seldom on exhibition although the Prince of Wales, it is said, was allowed to inspect it at a safe distance. It is apparently a piece of ivory two inches long and one inch thick, by far too large for any human mouth.

Each year, in July, occurs the "Procession of the Sacred Tooth" with a great display of wealth and reverence. The Hindu's mecca is Benares, where flows the sacred river. One of their chief occupations is keeping themselves clean in the filthy Ganges. Should a Mohammedan or a Christian come in close enough contact to touch a Hindu while he is performing any of his sacred duties, he must hurry away to wash again before proceeding. The Hindu lives on rice, having the greatest reverence for animals and the most fortunate beasts on earth are the cows and bulls which they hold sacred and allow to roam around their temple of red stone situated within a grove of stately trees where five-hundred monkeys are allowed absolute freedom. This is named the "Monkey Temple."

When a Hindu dies his wish is to expire near the sacred Ganges, for this they believe insures their safe entrance into Heaven.

A Midnight Charity.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE visitor to New York who wants to know something about "How the other half lives" and who is interested in the seamy side of life in a great city, can see strange sights if he will. Some of the saddest and most harrowing of these sights are to be seen at an hour when the favored half of the city are snug and comfortable in their beds with the cheering certainty of cheering certainty of a good breakfast in the morning and all the morning and all the other meals of the day provided for.

One of the strange sights illustrating the poverty running rampant in the city is the "bread line" that forms in the neighborhood of Tenth Street and Broadway at the hour of midnight. The story of the origin of the bread line is interesting. As long ago as the year 1876 Mr. Louis Fleischmann, owner of one of the largest bakeries in the city, decided that he would give to the poor all of the unsold bread that was "left over" at the close of the day in his bakeries. His business was not so very large at that time but it has grown to enormous proportions so that he now has hundreds of loaves of bread to give away where he had but a few to give in the beginning of this way mous proportions so that he now has hundreds of loaves of bread to give away where he had but a few to give in the beginning of this way of getting rid of his unsold bread.

Long before midnight the line of hungry applicants for the bread begin to form in line about midway between Fourth Avenue and Broadway. Sometimes there are as many as five-hundred in the line by the time the distribution of the bread begins. Sometimes there may be but three hundred, but the number is usually more than this. Nearly all of them are men. Now and then a forlorn, bedraggled-looking woman or a hungry boy falls into line with the shabby, ragged men. There are no limitations in regard to those who take their place in the line. Any one who is hungry enough to make a silent appeal for bread in this way may do so. No one is denied admittance to the line.

At the hour of midnight a light gleams out up at the head of the line and the tired and hungry applicants begin to move slowly forward for the light comes from an open doorway in which are several clean-looking men in the white caps and white aprons of bakers. Near the men are piles of bread in generous loaves and the grateful odor of good coffee comes from the doorway to add to the already eager appetite of the men in the line. Each applicant receives a loaf of bread and a mug of hot coffee without money and without price. Some of them do not give even the small return of a simple "thank you" for the food they have received, but the great majority of them are courteous and grateful enough to express their thanks.

Some of the men gnaw greedily at the bread and and gulp down the coffee the instant they get thanks.

Some of the men gnaw greedily at the bread and gulp down the coffee the instant they get it, while others drop quickly out of the line and hurry home with their loaf of bread to a hungry wife and children who are waiting for nungry wile and children who are waiting for the loaf. The distribution goes on until all of the applicants have been served, and it must be that the generous donor sometimes encroaches on his store of newly baked bread for it is not likely that there are always enough of the "left over" loaves to supply the long line that forms of coats is a Russian garment, three-quarter length, the loose back caught in softly at the belt by a band of folded black satin, sometimes set off by a handsome buckle, while the front is allowed to fall perfectly loose, fastening straight down from the left shoulder in double-breasted fashion. The sleeves are full bishop, with quite a large, loose cuff fastened with handsome buttons.

One of the new features in cloak decoration, whether the garment be of fur, velvet, or cloth, is the application to cuffs and collar of small, whole animals, with a number of dangling feet and tails. It is rather a costly fancy, but is most effective.

whole animals, with a number of dangling feet and tails. It is rather a costly fancy, but is most effective.

The shape of skirts remains about the same, tight-fitting around the hips and flaring out well at the feet. The flounce is used in a variety of forms, single or in sets. The double flounce is very pretty and exceedingly popular. When the material is thin enough to allow, a shirred flounce is pretty with the same mode of trimming arranged about the hips, while very soft stuffs are shirred around the neck to form a yoke, again into the girdle and at the top of sleeves, if the sleeves are long.

A handsome coat of broadcloth is quite short and perfectly tight-fitting, with little rounded tabs at back and front set off with rather large, flat brass buttons, exquisitely ornamented with carving. The sleeves are small at the top with quite a bell at the hand, where a tab flares out and is elaborated with a set of the buttons.

Street gowns of corduroy are to be very much worn, and when trimmed with fur and worn with a blouse of white satin or lace are marvelously fetching. A stunning one in pretty gray corduroy caught my attention. The skirt is tight and has a habit back, fastened at the side of the front with flat silver buttons. A nice flare is arranged at the foot by means of a double flounce, showing a pleated frill of silk underneath. The short Eton hangs perfectly loose and fastens across the breast with a large silver clasp. The coat is collarless, and with it can be worn a flat collar of the same or one of yellow lace, something which would harmonize smartly with the tone of the velvet.

Three-cornered hats are very much to the fore and are really most becoming to a young, pretty face. Those of white beaver are perfectly bewitching. A dainty one I have in mind was trimmed very simply with a small beaver animal, bunched up at one side with the little feet and tail allowed to dangle.

VERLOOKIN G all fanciful legends, Japan and China acquired the art of enameling about the last of the 16th cen-

The origin of this art is unknown, but all evidences point toward Persia and India and a few other parts of the mysterious east from whence came all valuable contributions to the art world.

The Indian enameling process is called "champleve" and the and which compares most tavorably with the oldest mosaics.

From the very beginning to the completion of a piece of Cloisonne the operation is most ingenious. Some pieces are entirely of porcelain, others of different metals. A porcelain piece, a vase for instance, is polished off, removing the glaze from the outside surface so that the enamel may adhere to the surface firmly—then the artist places over the paper design he has drawn a sheet of plate glass and through this follows his design with a flat wire on edge, bending it into the identical form of each blossom, leaf or dragon, as his design may be. In this way he outlines the figures, making little cells or "cloison" from whence arises the name "Cloisonne".

Often in a geometrical design many cells are made upon the same pattern.

This is the month of Thanksgiving, my dears, and I am quite sure that all of us can find plenty to be thankful for if we only look around a little for it. It is the last month of the autumn, and is generally held to be a dreary kind of a month, but we can make it cheery if we will. Now let us see what there is to trouble us in your letters. we will. Now let us se trouble us in your letters.

The first from the pile on my desk is from Cousin Hazel of Milwaukee, Wis., and she wants to know if a Christmas present from her to a very pleasant young man of her acquaintance would be out of place. On the contrary it would be quite appropriate, and I am sure the young man would appreciate it.

If he stops at a hotel you are under less obligations as a hostess.

Faggie, Greenwood, S. C.—There is no way to make a man prove that he loves you except to marry you. (2) Don't worry over the man who has stopped writing to you; he is not worth it. If he does not care, you certainly should not. (3) Never tell the man you love him until he has first told you so. A woman is not to be blamed for loving a man—she can't help that—but she can help telling him and she should.

The edge of this flat wire is then put to the desired position on the surface of the vase and secured there by means of glass solder, after which it is ready to receive the enamel. This desired position on the surface of the vase and secured there by means of glass solder, after which it is ready to receive the enamel. This enamel or any enamel is simply powdered glass. Pure enamel is a colorless compound and the colors are derived from a variety of oxides. Tin, for instance, gives a white, opaque enamel. The oxide of cobalt gives blue, oxide of copper, green, black calx of manganese gives a violet. Silver produces yellow, and the sulphates iron and alumnia red. When these enamels are in the form of paste, they are put into their proper cells between the wire strips and the vase is then baked in an oven. This baking process is continued many times. As the enamel heats and sinks into the cell it is filled and baked again and so on until it becomes the right thickness. This also, of course, aids in holding the wire to the porcelain. Then the rough and projecting surface is ground down with a coarse stone followed by finer stones until finally this is polished with charcoal and ready for the market.

An extremely rare kind of Cloisonne called "de plique a jour" was made first in Persia and later in China, the enamel being dexterously melted into cells with no background whatever. In making this the wire is bent into the desired patterns inside a mould where 'tis left while the cells are filled with the enamel paste and baked. After sufficient firing the mould is removed from this finished section and another portion of the design made in the same way and so on until the whole vase is in sections and only requires soldering together to make the piece complete and almost transparent, having no background.

Another wonderful feature is the blending of two distinct colors in one cell; this requires extremely delicate and marvelous workmanship, and is introduced where shading is necessary.

of the Revolution were Pro-English in their feelings, and afterward became known as Tories. Although we are accustomed to think of our forefathers as all being patriots in the early part of that war, the great majority of Americans were adherents to King George; those that had everything to gain and little to lose, were generally of the Insurrection, although in Virginia the richer element sided with the patriots. It was only through the stupidity of the English ministers, and the blunders of their generals in America, and undoubtedly lack of tact of both, that solidified America for the patriots; many times the rebellion was almost snuffed out, and could not have succeeded but for the aid of the French. In after years there was a very strong division of people throughout the new states, many of whom desired an aristocratic government, while an even number desired the true republisher form.

ment, while an even number desired the true republican form. Washington and Hamilton were considered almost monarchists, while of all the great men of that time, Jefferson was the only decided man of democratic desires when Jefferson became President, he was in constant warfare with the opposition throughout the country; nothing was too bad to be said about him, and yet, he has proved the most far-seeing of all those statesmen with the exception of Washington.

To Jefferson, and to him alone, belongs the credit of having purchased against every on-credit of having purchased against every op-position what is known as the Louisiana Pur-chase, and which comprises all of the United States west of the Mississippi river, and north of Texas, the intervening States and Territories and California, which were then embraced in Old Mexico, and in memory of which great historical event this next fair is to be held. In a short time COMFORT will give a short histori-cal sketch on the Louisiana Purchase, and endeavor to tell of the extreme importance this great purchase was to the growth and development of the United States.

ment of the United States.

Those who admire Jefferson will have a chance to see at the Exposition named something which will especially interest them. It will be the original monument, designed by himself, and first erected over his grave at Monticello, Va. It is a simple obelisk of granite, eight feet in height, and without the slightest attempt at adornment. The monument will form the centre of the Missouri University exhibit. It has stood for years upon the campus of that institution. When Jefferson died, among his papers was found a rough sketch in ink of an obelisk, together with this

The Unlucky Opal.

HE opal, though one of the most beautiful of precious stones has always been under a ban, as for hundreds of years it has had the reputation of bringing bad luck to its possessor. This superstition is said to have had its origin in Italy where the opal was extremely popular two or three hundreds of years ago. A plague started in Venice and it was noticed that in the cases of those who wore the opal that died of the plague, just before death the stone shone with an unnatural brilliancy, and that after the victim's death it became dull and lustreless. This it is now explained was because the opal is very susceptible to warmth and the heat of the patient's fever caused the extra lustre of the the patient's fever caused the extra lustre of the stone, which passed away with the death of the owner as his body became cold. Whether this is the explanation or not, it remains a fact that the opal has always been considered one of the most unlucky of stones. In connection with this superstition a story is told of a gentleman who took an opal he owned to a jeweller, with instructions that it be sold. Ever since he had owned the stone, he claimed that bad luck had followed him in all his ventures. It was found upon examination that the opal was an imitation stone—a fact which must have somewhat disturbed the theories of its owner in regard to its sinister properties. its sinister properties.

How Paper is Made.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

S in the case of many another good thing, the credit of inventing or discovering paper and its process of manufacture lies with the Chinese. This was long before the Christian era, and even today some of our finest paper comes from the East. The Arabians learned the secret from the Chinese, and they introduced paper-making into Europe about learned the secret from the Chinese, and they introduced paper-making into Europe about the 8th century.

The Egyptians were also among the earliest paper-makers. Thin layers of inner bark or pith were peeled from the papyrus stalk, which grew abundantly on the banks of the Nile, sometimes attaining a height of ten to twenty feet and as thick as a man's arm. The thin layers of pith were laid together with overlapping edges, then three or more thicknesses were laid one above the other; the whole mass was then dampened, pressed and dried in the sun. Rice-paper is today made by the Chinese by a similar process. In Paris there is preserved a papyrus manuscript thirty feet long.

The Romans improved on the Egyptian process by soaking their paper in flour paste and then pounding it smooth. These processes, however, were soon found inadequate for supplying the growing demand for paper, and the next step was to use the fibers of other plants by reducing them to a pulp and then felting them together by pounding and drying. An immense variety of different vegetable substances were been found suitable for this purpose, though cotton and linen rags are found to be the best substances. Old rag paper is used over again for making new after the ink has been dissolved by chemicals. About 1772 a German professor named Schaffers, produced a book containing sixty different kinds of paper, made from as many different materials. In 1788 a French manufacturer received a medal for making paper from bark, though the idea of introducing wood paper is supposed to have been suggested by Reamur, as a result of his studying the composition of hornets' neets.

The vegetable fibers of which paper is composed depend for their value upon the presence of cellulose, which is the basis of all vegetation. Cotton is nearly pure cellulose. The manufacture of this and later days is full of appeals to the people to save rags. But in spite of all appeals the supply of rags could not begin to equal the demand of the paper makers for material of which th and in our great paper mills it is made by machinery.

In making rag paper by machinery the rags are first thrown into a thrasher, which thoroughly beats them and extracts a good deal of their dirt. They are then carefully sorted, buttons, hooks, and other foreign substances removed, and they are then cut in small pieces and thrown into immense boilers. Here they are thoroughly boiled with chemicals until they are soft and white. In a series of washers and beaters they are further cut up and washed, until they are reduced to pulp. Clay or other filler is now added, coloring matter in the case of colored paper, or bluing in the case of white paper, which without this would look yellowish is also introduced into the beater, and a sizing of various chemicals. This part of the process is an extremely delicate one, for it is here that the finished quality of the paper to be made is determined, and the proper mixing of the various ingredients to produce the desired result calls for the highest degree of skill. When the pulp is ready it goes to the Foudrinier machine. This is the invention of a Frenchman, Louis Robert by name, who patented it in 1799. Later the rights were bought by the English firm whose name it bears. At first it met with the greatest opposition on the part of hand workmen, but it gained rapidly in favor in spite of this.

The Foudrinier machine is six feet high and about one hundred and twenty feet long. The pulp is supplied to a tank called a "stuff-chest," and is kept in suspense by constant agitation. It is then squeezed and sucked through slots shaped like an inverted V, sometimes only one-thousandth of an inch in diameter upon an endless band of woven wire cloth. This band is in some machines over nine feet wide and thirty-five or forty feet long, and is supported upon small rollers. The flow of the pulp is regulated by cocks and bands running parallel with the cloth so that the paper can be made the proper width and thickness.

As the wire cloth with its load of pulp moves along, the water, surplus fibre and coloring matter drain through into a vat below called a "save-all" and is carried back again to the starting point. The wire cloth is given a shaking motion, which felts the fibres of the pulp together. Further on in its journey more water is removed by suction and a roll covered with wire impresses the paper with the desired pattern and watermarks.

with wire impresses the paper with the desired pattern and watermarks.

From the wire the web of paper passes through rollers which squeeze out the remaining water and smooth and clean it of adhering fibres. Heated rollers dry and polish it. If the paper is to be "tub-sized" it passes through a vat of gelatine made from clippings of hides, horns and similar materials mixed with alum. This fills up the pores of the paper and makes it nonabsorbent. After this it is again rolled and dried.

This fills up the pores of the paper and makes it nonabsorbent. After this it is again rolled and dried.

This is, in the main, the process of paper making, though it has innumerable variations in the manufacture of paper for different purposes. Super-calendered paper is given an extra polish between heated rollers. Fancy papers are given their patterns or peculiar effects by being run between embossed rolls. Colored papers are either painted or varnished, while by the use of various chemicals special papers are made for photography, lithography, telegraphy, or of different changeable color effects. Sandpaper is made by sprinkling a paper covered with glue and brushing off the surplus. Cork paper for packing glass is made by covering a soft paper with ground cork. Tobacco paper for cigarettes is made by showering tobacco dust on the damp web, and pressing it in. By the use of sulphuric acid on unsized paper a kind of parchment is made much like the real article. Special papers are made for almost every purpose that ingenuity can devise. Of late years paper has been used in a great variety of new ways as in the building of pails, tubs, boats, railway car wheels, lumber and in other ways that would not be thought possible on account of the frail nature of the material.

The Days of the Week.

is said that the Greeks and Romans had no such division of time before the introduction of Christianity. Aside from the religious significance of the seventh day for rest, it has been found a most convenient division of the lunar month. During the French Revolution the observance of Sunday was abolished, and the week was made ten days in length. It was found, however, that a rest day oftener was absolutely essential to the physical welfare of the people, and it was found necessary to return to the old method of counting the week as seven days.

It is usually stated that the days of the week are named after the seven planets of the Egyptian astronomers. Thus Sunday is the sun's day; Monday the moon's day; Tuesday is called by Saxon people from Tiw, a deity who corresponded to Mars in the Roman mythology; Wednesday comes from Woden, who was the Saxon equivalent of Mercury; Thursday from Thor, who was to the Saxons what Jupiter was to the Romans; Friday from Fria, the Saxon's Venus, while Saturday is Saturn's day. The Chinese days of the week are named for iron, wood, water, earth, and air.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE sun touches the first point of the celestial spin (apricorn when the local clocks at Washing-ton, the seat of our national government, indicate twenty-eight minutes past seven in the morning of the twenty-second of December, the seven has been erected. Rather a remarkable condition of the heavenly bodies is observed at that time. Six of the nine heavenly bodies is observed at that time. Six of the nine heavenly bodies are found at that moment just beneath the carry, Sun, Saturn, Jupiter and Mars in the order named. Venus will be in the 2nd house, the Moon will occupy the 5th house, and Neptune the 7th house of the figure. Herschel is the nearest to the horizon and he is followed by Mercury, Sun, Saturn, Jupiter and Mars in the order named. Venus will be in the 2nd house, the Moon will occupy the 5th house, and Neptune the 7th house of the figure as a could be wished. The passage of the fiery and violent war planet Mars in the past five or six weeks up to and past the great bodies Jupiter and Saturn, whose great conjunction was noted in our last, will have excited both the financial and religious affairs of the world in a marked degree. Financial misfortune will have overtaken more than one of the great commercial and monetary enterprises and some unusual fluctuations in the money markets have resulted. Nor do the promises of this figure indicate very speedy relief and tranquility from this excited and feverish state for some weeks to come. Secret organizations subversive of order and constituted authority have been and will continue to be fruitful in trouble, and legislative measures for correction of the mischief will be sought to be enacted by Congress, though not without some strange antagonism among legislative members. I regret to note some inharmony or disagreement between the Executive and Legislative departments of our government, probably in the first half of January. This quarter will be one of unusual excitement to the President, inclining him to be headstrong and rash in act and he will be wise t nsual.

The medical fraternity are cautioned that there will be considerable increase of malarial and intermittent diseases. Unusual obstinacy of diseases of the organs of digestion, including particularly the liver and kidneys, will be noted in practice.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR DECEMBER, 1901.

DECEMBER. 1—Sunday. Conditions contribute more to excitement and nervous irritability than to quiet contemplation of religious subjects; see that the tongue does not immerse thee in unpleasant controversies; the day is not recommended for any move of consequence in connection with church affairs.

2-Monday. This day gives energy and enterprise and invites activity in all the walks of life, but especially for the machinist, engineer, mechanic, traveler, military man, the dealers in metals and cattle, and all in the avocations wherein fire, chemicals, steam and sharp instruments are employed; do not expect favor from thy superior in the afternoon nor any permanent gratification from the social or dramatic entertainment in the evening.

3-Tuesday. During this day actively urge all matters pertaining to real estate and its improvement: make contracts, execute deeds, bargain for houses and lands, consult architects and have thy dealings with printers, publishers, stationers and persons employed in the lower or subordinate offices of state. Give preference, if any, to the afternoon for engaging in literary and scientific pursuits; commercial men should take advantage of prevailing benevolent conditions, making contracts and pushing all business deals to the utmost; do correspondence, adjust accounts, and appeal to the mind for its best efforts during the last two-thirds of this day.

5—Thuradlay. The middle hours of this day bring disappointment and embarrassment and discourage the commencement of any important matter, particularly such as relates to houses, lands, mines, oil wells, or any of the products of the earth; the very early and very late hours are more favorable for dealings with large corporations, government bodies, etc.

6—Friday. Musical and artistic pursuits and the elegant occupations generally, suffer peculiar annoyances and embarrassments at this time and the gentle sex appear at a disadvantage or suffer in greater proportion than usual; strange matrimonial alliances are probable at this time, particularly between youth and age and elopements are prompted much to the later unhappiness of the contracting parties; let all avoid this for any matrimonial engagement. This is peculiarly true of persons born about the 7th of January, 21st of April, 4th of June, 8th or 24th of July, 24th of October, or the 6th of December, of past years. Those persons so born, who are engaged in the elegant pursuits are likely to be now suffering more than usual business annoyances or to be in poor health. They should exercise more than usual care in all their affairs, acting conservatively rather than assuming risks of consequence.

S-Nunday. One of the best Sabbath days of the month; the efforts of the clergy will be especially happy and effective and minds dwell with earnestness and zeal in the contemplation of religious subjects.

9-Monday. Be in no haste to trade in real estate or make purchases for general trade in the forenoon; as the monon hour is passed, however, let every energy be given to the pursuits of literary and educational matters, also to all the elegant pursuits; do important correspondence and make engagements relative to books, and publications of all kinds; urge educational matters and all literary and scientific efforts; employ servants and have musical and dramatic entertainments.

10—Tuesday. Not a favorable day for any important beginning; do not travel needlessly and beware of incurring the displeasure of those in authority; government officials and officers of rairroads and other large corporations will not be favorably disposed. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday, do thou exercise extraordinary care in all thine acts for several weeks to come.

11-Wednesday. Give preference today to all pursuits that are concerned with giving gratification to mankind; deal in poetical works and the elegant in literary productions generally; purchase for use articles of jewelry, wearing apparel, and furnishings.

12—Thursday. Conditions are somewhat conflicting on this day and only the routine affairs of life should receive thine attention; new beginnings are best deferred to a more opportune time.

13-Friday. 14—Saturday. Shun usurers and old and eccentric persons and keep thy wits about thee; be not deceived in any venture purporting to be profitable; scrutinize representations and be slow to engage in enterprises this day presenting themselves to the mind. Persons born about the 6th of January, April, July and October, of past years, are cautioned to safeguard health in every way during these passing weeks. Persons so born who are compelled to be about machinery or in underground places or those where there is danger from fire or explosives should exercise the greatest care at this time in exposing themselves where violent harm is probable; those so born who are in the habit of indulging in intoxicating beverages must now look out that they do not do themselves irreparable harm or invite disastrous losses in their business; they should be temperate in habits, prudent in diet, and careful in all their affairs, even more so than in general in their lives.

25—Wednesday. Christmas. The middle hours of this day are the best, but the influences of Christmas Eve and Christmas night combine to invite unusual indulgence in pleasure and its apprehended that too much "good cheer" will make intemperance more than usually mischievous for the welfare of many in these closing days of the year. Temperance in diet and habits is peculiarly recommended for the time.

An unpromising day; discouraging for the purse and embarrassing to the progress of enterprises; be temperate in habit and careful in diet, especially avoiding surfeits; do not run risks in speculations on this day unless the nativity be exceptionally strong in this particular; hold the purse-strings firmly and deal not in real estate or agricultural or mining products; keep out of quarrels in the latter part of this day.

The closing days of the year do not offer as much assistance for the favorable outcome of enterprises as could be wished and REGULUS urges his friends to defer making beginnings in enterprises of consequence until more benevolent conditions prevail; do not wed on this day nor expect success in the elegant pursuits or in dealings in fancy or ornamental goods; beware of giving offence to thine employer from whom thou shouldst ask no favors at this time.

29—Sunday. The mind will be especially active on this day and religious discourses will be carnest and eloquent.

30-Monday. Beware of quarrels or contentions in the early morning, observing more than usual care against rashness during the first part of the day; let all honor-able efforts be made in established business as the noon hours are passed, particularly in matters concerned with houses, lands, mines, or any kind of building materials; avoid public officers and dealing with organizations of men in the afternoon.

The Schley Inquiry.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AST month Comfort gave its readers a short article on the unfortunate controversy which has brought about the present Court of Inquiry, the testimony and arguments of which are filling many columns of the daily papers. Much of the language is so technical that but few understand what it all amounts to, and fewer still care. The fact that the American fleet under direct command of Commodore Schley actually annihilated the powerful and dreaded Spanish fleet on the 3rd of July, three years ago, seems to be the whole story.

Apparently, whether true or not, there has been a combined attempt to belittle Schley. At best, his fault seems from all the testimony against him, to have been momentary indecision, which led at worst to slight delays, which so far have been but trifles, the fact that shines out above all is that Schley, highest in position, fought the winning battle throughout from start to finish and that is undisputed. The fact that the Brooklyn made the runaway "loop" proves nothing at most more than that momentary indecision, for without loss she

The fact that the Brooklyn made the runaway "loop" proves nothing at most more than that momentary indecision, for without loss she was in the thick again. Her commander, Capt. Cook claims entire responsibility for this movement. The writer has seen soldiers get ahead of their fellows and finding themselves too close to the enemy fall back and then go in again where the heaviest fighting was. Were they cowardly in running away, or was it good judgment?

COMFORT believes that outside a certain set the American the American public has formed a very strong opinion relative to this; but it is no time to express it now. Still, if anyone wishes to test it let him casually ask the opinion let him casually ask the opinion of the first twenty people of intelligence he may meet. In the meantime, much testimony is being taken and it seems to us a lot of time being wasted over non-essential facts in the campaign, which were unnoticed and unreprimanded at the time, which are now made to appear, if true, dangerously near treating the same of the campaign and the same of the campaign and the same of the campaign and the campaign and the same of the campaign and the camp and unreprimanded at the time, which are now made to appear, if true, dangerously near treason. As a fact, the campaign was the most totally effective of any naval enterprise in the history of modern nations, with the possible exception of Trafalgar.

Therefore, Comfort can only advise its readers to be patient and listen for the final report, which will undoubtedly officially decide the right and wrong of the matter, whether it changes anyone's private opinion or not.

Trials in the United States Navy must partake of one of three forms; a court of inquiry, a general court-martial, or a summary court-martial. A court of inquiry or a general court-martial can be ordered only by the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, or the commander-in-chief of the American fleets on foreign stations. The form known as the court of in-quiry, like the present investiga-tion, is employed exclusively for the investigation of the conduct of the conduct of commissioned of-ficers, while the general court-martial embraces investigations of investigations of the conduct of of-cers and also the trial of enlisted men charged with murder or other crimes, or serious breaches of discipline, such as an assault upon an

A court of inquiry, contrary to the public opinion, by no means always implies censure; on the contrary, it is the most usual thing for an officer to ask for it in order that the record may show any particular action involved no fault or mistake on his part. Judge Advocate fault or mistake on his part. Judge Advocate Lemly is the same as a prosecuting attorney in a state trial, acting for and appearing as the council of the Navy Department. The counsel of Rear Admiral Schley is headed by Isidor aynor, a leader of the Maryland bar.

There have been several notable courts of in-quiry in the history of the American Navy. One most celebrated in its time but now hardly One most celebrated in its time but now hardly known even in history, was the dispute which arose between Commodore Perry and Captain Jesse D. Elliot, who commanded the ship Niagara, in the battle of Lake Erie, as to what degree of credit that ship was entitled. This question involved questions of Elliot's bravery as well as to the share of prize money the Niagara's officers and men were entitled. After many attempts Elliot was able to secure a court of inquiry into his conduct and was completely vindicated. On this occasion the complex question of an absent officer claiming entire question of an absent officer claiming entire credit for a victory which he did not attend in person was not raised.

An American Lord.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ISITORS to Newburyport in Massachusetts are sure to have pointed out to them the stately mansion in which there once lived that eccentric character Lord Timoth y Dexter whose title was self-given as the outgrowth of his own colossal conceit and vanity. Lord Timothy was one of the most noted characters of his day. He was a strange He was a strange combination of shrewdness, ig no-rance and vanity. He was one of the most suc-cessful merchants of his day, and he dabbled in literature to the extent of at least one small These three forms have been so outlined possibly as to give the impression that each has distinct functions, and yet, in reality a court of inquiry is presumably merely a preliminary to a general court-martial. In a word, it may be said to correspond to a grand jury on shore, and just as a grand jury reviews the facts in any case brought to their attention, to determine whether or not the circumstances make it justifiable to bring the person or persons implicated before the bar of justice, so the naval court of inquiry insures a competent preliminary examination and enables an officer to present a defense and, if possible, to puncture some of the charges made against him without having been subjected to the stigma of a courtmartial.

A court of inquiry, contrary to the public cargo was sold at a large profit. At another time he invited financial disaster by purchasing an enormous quantity of whalebone for "ship's stays," as he declared. But suddenly the value of whalebone greatly increased, and again was Lord Timothy triumphant in a venture that seemed foolbardy in its beginning. ture that seemed foolhardy in its beginning.

Lord Timothy gives the following account of his birth in his "Pickle for the Knowing Ones:" "I was born 1747 Jan. 22; on this day in the morning, a great snow storm in the signs of the seventh house; whilst Mars came forward Jupiter stood by to hold the candle. I was to be a great man."

The birthplace of this foreordained "great man" was Malden, Massachusetts. He served an apprenticeship to a leather dresser in his young manhood and then went to Newburyport where he married a young widow who was the owner of a house and a bit of ground. A shop was built on a part of the ground and the rest of it was converted into a tanyard. Erratic as he was Lord Timothy attended closely to business and he prospered from the first to business and he prospered from the first. His vanity increased with his wealth, and popularity became the god of his idolatry. He became owner of a handsome country seat in the town of Chester, and he was for some time undecided as to whether he should call himself King of Chester or Lord Timothy Dexter. He finally decided upon the latter title, and as his friends good-naturedly accepted the title as readily as if it were genuine, and addressed him by it, it served all the purpose of a real title.

Lord Dexter built a stately mansion in New-

Lord Dexter built a stately mansion in Newburyport, set up a coach and four, and sought to "live up to his title." His home was made most conspicuous by a number of life-size and tyery expensive statues of noted men set on lofty pedestals in front of his house. There were statues of Washington, Bonaparte, Lord Nelson, Thomas Jefferson, King George, Franklin, John Adams, William Pitt, John Hancock and other famous men. Lord Dexter added a statue of himself to this illustrious group, and with the lack of modesty that was characteristic of him he put below his own statue these words: "I am the greatest philosopher in the western world."

There were also figures of lions and sentinels on the grounds, and people came from far and near to see the Dexter mansion and its statuary. The mansion is today very much as it was in the day of its singular owner, but the statues were removed by Lord Dexter's heirs.

Lord Dexter had a tomb prepared for himself in a summer house in his garden. He refers to this tomb in his "Pickle for the Knowing Ones:" "Heare will lie in box the first Lord in Americake the first Lord Dexter made by the voice of Hampshire state my brave fellows Affirmed it they gave me the title and so let it goue for as much as it will fetch it wonte give me any breade but take from me the contrary. Lord Dexter was very charitable, and his Lord Dexter was very charitable, and his purse was open to the poor. He not only gave away much money during his lifetime but he left money by his will to be used for benevolent purposes. He died in October, 1806, in the sixtieth year of his age. #### The Kid's Christmas.

WRITTEN FOR COMPORT BY SARAH E. GANNETT.

Copyright, 1901, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

HERE'S that coon staring in at the window again! That's the third time this week that I have caught him at it and I'm going to put an end to it," and Harvey Young dashed out of the room and soon returned, dragging by the collar an unwilling specimen of the colored race about twelve years old. Ragged, dirty, lean and shivering with cold, he presented a strong contrast to the two occupants of the warm, bright room into which he had been so unceremoniously introduced.

"Now, then, young un," said Harvey, releasing his hold on the urchin, "give us an account of yourself. What are you prying into honest people's houses in this way for? No you don't, young man! Not much!" as the child made a dart for the door of the room. "I'll just lock this door and put the key in my pocket until you have answered my questions. Come now, out with it!"

'Worn't doin' nothin'," muttered the boy. "'Worn't doin' nothin'?' Yes, you were, too.

You've been spying on us for a week, and I just think that you intended to rob us. I've a great mind to turn you over to the police, and I will, too, if you don't own up."

"I warn't doin' no harm, 'deed I worn't!" whimpered the boy. "I was on'y-" and he hesitated, turned gray with fright and the big tears stood in his eyes.

"Oh, Harvey," exclaimed his sister Amy, a pretty young girl of sixteen. "you frighten him so that he doesn't know what to say. Let me try. See here, little boy, what shall I call you? Ike! Well, Ike, you are too cold to tell a straight story, I know. Come over here by the fire and warm your fingers and toes a bit. We are not going to hurt you, but we want very much to know why you are keeping such a watch upon us."

The boy responded to the compelling pressure of the gentle hand upon his shoulder by seating himself in a low chair by the open fire and spreading his little black claws to the grateful warmth, and then, glancing up into the winning face above him he gathered courage to say:

"I on'y wanted to see yer gittin' ready for Crismis."

"Well, I like that!" interposed Harvey. "Stealing our Christmas secrets and-"Hush, Harvey. He didn't intend to steal, I am sure; but tell us, Ike, why you wanted to see us at work. You must have some reason for it."

"'Deed, I wasn't goin' to steal," answered the boy, eagerly, "but—but—" and he stopped.
"Out with it," said Harvey, impatiently. "We can't wait all night."

The boy glanced at Amy, and seeing encour- this last a little proudly.

agement in her smiling face he said:

"Well, it's this-a-way. Yer see, Jim an' me we's partners, an' we's got a little kid to home what's lame an' sick, an' coughs orful; an' now Crismis is comin', an' she wants a Crismis s'prise the wust kind. Jim an' me, we wants to give it to her, cos she never had no good times, on'y poundin's an' kicks an' starvin's; but we ain't never had no Crismis, either of us, an' we don't know how it ought to be did; an' I heard you two tellin' some other folks that you was goin' to have one, an' that you was goin' to work fer it evenin's, an' so I t'ought I'd watch out an' maybe I'd fin' out how to do it. Dat's all, 'deed 'tis, honest."

"Who is this kid, as you call her? Your sister?" asked Amy.

"My sister? No, I ain't done got no sister. Her name's Katie Stark, an' she's a pore little lame thing, what goes on crutches. Dey 'buse her orful, cos she's lame an' can't do nothin'; an' long 'bout two weeks ago her mudder was sent up for stealin' an' gittin' drunk, an' ole Mis Plunkett, where she lived, turned her out on the street in a hard rainstorm, cos she couldn't earn the grub she ate; an' me an' Jim we found her a-settin' on the curb-stone in the rain a-cryin'."

"Who is Jim?" interrupted Harvey.

"Didn't I done tole yer? Jim an' me's partners."

"Partners in what?"

"Oh, we lives together an' shares what we earns. Sometimes we don't get much."

"What do you do?"

"We has newspaper routes, and sells Stars' an' 'Posts' and de 'Times', an' den we goes to de markets in de mornin's an' totes baskets for de ladies. Some days we gets a right smart o' money dat way, an' some days we don't get 'nough to eat. But, yer see," the boy added with a bright look, "we don't have to pay no rent where we lives."

"How is that? Where do you live?"

Ike started and a look of fear came into his eyes. Evidently he had not intended to let out that secret, but the warmth and the interest of the young people had led him to say more than he was aware of.

"I ain' gwine tell yer dat. Yer'll peach to de cops, an' den we'll hab to git out."

"No, we won't. Tell away."

"Honor bright?"

"Honor bright," answered Harvey, laughing a little at the idea of sharing the secret of a darkey. "That is," he added, "if I find there's no harm in it."

"'Tain't no harm. We don't interfere wid nobody, an' a feller's got to have a place to sleep, an' to keep de kid, now, ain't he?"

"Well, tell us where it is," said Harvey, impatiently.

"Hoh! yes, an' have you runnin' to de p'lice wid de news!" scornfully replied Ike. "Not much I don' tell."

"Oh, come, now," exclaimed Harvey, "I'm not so mean as all that. I won't tell on you. Out with it."

"Well," said Ike, "do yer know that big pile of lumber an' old iron down back of de B. & O. depot?"

"Yes."

"Well, Jim an' me used to sleep there last summer, an' when we got de kid on our hands we t'ought it would make a fine private apartment for her; so we found an ole dry goods box an' turned it on its side, an' hid de place where we go in, an' dere you are. Suite o' rooms at de Arlington, we calls em, on'y dey is very quiet an' retired. But I wish 'twor a bit warmer," he added, musingly. "De kid shivers some, an' den she coughs orful, too."

"Gracious!" exclaimed Harvey, "I should think she would. The very idea of a sick baby living in a box in this weather. Why don't you take her to the Board of Charities or to the Washington Asylum or some such place? She ought to be in a Home of some kind and you

The boy started with alarm.

"But she don't want to go to no 'sylum. She's 'fraid o' such places, an' we promised her she shouldn't be took there. She cried orful returned to the carriage for two immense cos she t'ought we-all was goin' to take her to baskets and then, blanketing his horses, he the 'thorities. No, she won't go to no 'sylum, was ready to assist in preparing the "s'prise" not while me an' Jim can help it," and the boy drew up his tiny frame proudly.

"But she'll die of the cold in that box, and then the police will arrest you and Jim for murder."

The boy's face instantly fell and all the light went out of it. Evidently the idea was not a new one to him, for he muttered: "She ain't gwine die. We-all's done got a piece o' mattin' to put over her, an' some newspapers, an' I'll get a comforble soon's I "Matting and newspapers! Gracious! Oh, here are papa and mamma at last. I thought they would never come home. Oh, papa, just listen to this," and Harvey plunged headlong into Ike's pitiful little story of devotion and self sacrifice, to which his parents listened with great interest.

"And now, papa," he finished, "Don't you think that Katie ought to go to some kind of a Home?"

"Katie ain't gwine to no Home!" put in Ike, desperately. "Jim an' me we done promised her that she shouldn't, an' me keeps our word,'

"And so do we keep our word, my boy," answered Mr. Young, gently; "and Katie shall not be taken from you against your will; but we want to make you all more comfortable if we can. So if you will eat this hot supper which Amy has brought you, mother and I will see what can be done."

Poor little Ike's eyes sparkled at the sight of the food and he started toward it eagerly, and then stopped, saying:

"Ef you'd gi' me a paper bag I'd like to take it home to Jim an' the kid."

"No, no, my boy," answered Mrs. Young; "this is all for you; you shall have more to take to Katie and Jim." And Ike waited for nothing more but ate as if famished.

When he had finished to the last crumb Mrs. Young said:

"Now here is supper for Jim and a bottle of hot milk for Katie. Coax her to drink it all and then wrap her warmly in this big old quilt before she goes to sleep. Here is another for you and Jim to put over yourselves; and now we want you to promise to be here again, all three of you at ten o'clock tomorrow morning."
"T' kid too?"

"Yes, and Jim. I think we can find you all a better place to sleep than that dry-goods box." "T' ain't---"

"No, you will be perfectly free to go away whenever you wish to do so.''

"Sure 'nuff? Den we-all will come an' tank yer kindly mam," and Ike disappeared into the night loaded with bundles.

The next morning rain was falling heavily and the streets were running rivers of water, and as ten o'clock came and passed the Youngs concluded that the little "coons" would not leave the shelter of their box that morning; but long after the appointed time a queer little procession came creeping up the fashionable thoroughfare of Q. street, and stopped in front of the Young residence. It consisted of lke and a boy even smaller than himself, both streaming with rain and carrying between them a rude litter of poles and matting in which was an invisible something wrapped in the old quilts given to Ike the evening before. The cavalcade was speedily conducted to the kitchen and the soaked covers of the litter being unfolded revealed a minute, wizened little colored girl of six years with a pitiful hump between her small shoulders. She was evidently very ill and gasped for breath as she coughed.

"Thought we-all wasn't never goin' to get here," remarked Ike.

"Why didn't you come in the street cars? Father gave you the tickets!" exclaimed "Case de c'nductor wouldn't let us on," said Ike. "He say git a ambulance an' take her to de horspitle. She too sick to ride in de cars. So Jim an' me we jes' toted her."

"All the way?"

"'Cose; what-all else mought we do?"

"Well," said Mr. Young, "you are good boys to the little thing and I like you for it; but now pull up your chair and eat your breakfasts, you and Jim, and then the carriage will be here for us."

Wild alarm was instantly visible on all the little black faces.

"Oh, you need not be frightened," said Mr. Young, smiling, "we are not going to an institution of any kind but over on Pomeroy street where there is an old colored Auntie who lives all alone in a nice little house. She is getting old and lame and needs just such active boys as you two to live with her and help her. She will take good care of Katie and when she is well she can help, too.'

It was the "Night before Christmas, and all through the house" of Aunt Nancy "not a creature was stirring", when a low knock came at the outer door. Aunt Nanc; was expecting it, however, and her turbaned head shortly appeared in the doorway and admitted into her neat little parlor Harvey and Amy Young, both well laden with bundles; while a servant bore a small tree already planted in its box. Setting this up in the corner prepared for it he and in an hour the tree, laden with warm clothing and a liberal sprinkling of toys, candies and fruits, stood reaching out its branches with invitation to Christmas joy and gladness in every spray. A turkey "wid all de fixin's," as Aunt Nancy delightedly expressed it, together with a big plum pudding, were piled on a paper on the floor, and the Youngs prepared to depart.

"But are you sure the children are asleen, Aunt Nancy?" questioned Amy.

"Lawsy, yes, honey. Dey'll sleep t'roo anyting. Look yere an' see fer youse'f," and Aunt Nancy opened the door leading into the warm kitchen and the tiny bedroom beyond; but alas for her rash assertion! Propped up among the snowy pillows of Aunt Nancy's own bed in a corner of the kitchen, and carefully wrapped by Ike in a shawl, sat Katie, now rapidly recovering from her cold under Aunt Nancy's care, her black eyes big and round with wonder at the sounds going on in the next room; while Ike and Jim, two little ebony shapes in bare feet and nighties, were dancing noiselessly but excitedly from bedroom to

The little black faces clouded over at once, and the boys turned to go into the bedroom a they were bidden, but Ike turned back to say:

"'Deed. Aunt Nancy, we t'ought Santa Claus had done come by de sourid in de parlor, an's we t'ought de s'prise was ready."

arms in a minute, and the child hung over to in speechless delight, paying no further attention to the tree or to the chatter of the boys. At last Aunt Nancy declared they mustall go to bed at once, and in the morning each should have a share from the tree. She attempted to take the doll from Katie, but Amy caught a glimpse of the brimming eyes and trembling lips and the doll was instantly restored to her arms.

The Meeting House Bonanza.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY OSCAR S. SEAVER.

ES sir," began my old friend Sandy Low, "there have been some ruther strange runs of luck in these parts. Now there's ther meetin' house, fust church established in Montana." Sandy pointed to a churchy looking structure half way down from the office of the Twin Lead Silver Mine where we sat smoking and the ore railroad leading from Spruce City to the Valley Smelters. "Calate you never heard of ther Reverend Dick Grilby and his meetin' house bonanza. No? Well you can figure you're it, then.

"Now Grilby struck Spruce City about '70 when it was a placer camp, wild as they made 'em you can bet. Regular roarin' hell all ther time. Couldn't breathe unless you roared. Wouldn't think it now would you-a tuck me up in bed little community like this? No sir! Now there were eight other camps down ther gulch considerably wild themselves, and as Grilby came into camp that way, he had to pass ther whole procession. 'Bout ther time he reached ther band which was Spruce City, he figured that he'd located about as much cussedness as one sky pilot had any use fer, and same bein' biled down in the bottom of our gulch handy like, he calated he'd stay. So me bein' single and a respectable sort of a cuss, he went snacks on my cabin.

"Wall ther camp wan't sendin' him no dinner cards. Couldn't figure on his use. But I seed Grilby was a square feller and got to likin' him. The boys at the Paradise expected he'd begin to rant about ther gilded halls of vice and sich and they might have to hurt his feelin's puttin' him and ther camp on congenial terms. Red Harvey, ther proprietor ruther egged on sich feelin's, expectin' there'd be fun.

But Grilby warnt that sort. He was a big feller, didn't look perticularly tame, read his bible considerable but didn't pester ther boys with it a bit. What stuck in his crop was what he called ther grounded viciousness place which meant ther hooray times Sundays at ther Paradise. Every time he heard yellin' or shootin' he'd grit his teeth and git ugly until one wide open night when ther whole gulch came in to camp and was ther cause of three funerals next day, Grilby up and swore he'd turn ther Paradise from ther hell trap it was into a house of ther Lord.

"That's ther house of ther lord down there, pardner; just as he said he'd do; and I cal'ate I'm ther oldest member countin' absences.

"Well, havin' laid out his proposition he didn't git figits whenever he heard a hooray time goin' on. Just because he didn't rant and yell and git argumentative ther boys had to give up importin' a bucket of tar which they had speculated on. Red Harvey was ruther disappinted at that, bein' ruther an ornery cuss. Asked me one day when my pardner ther sky pilot was comin' down to give his song and dance. I says, 'pretty soon,' but ther dance would be on ther chest of ther fust man what didn't encore his song, which shet Red Harvey with ther boys private like. He could talk more horse sense in a minute than you could figure out in a week, could swap ther lie of any man in camp and pretty soon he had our cabin so packed Sunday mornin's listening to him five minutes to git a full breath of air.

"But that warn't ther preacher's game. As able treatment. Now he begun to strike in God fearin' community.

"Now ther pints in favor of sich piety were two. Spruce City and ther rest of ther gulch was gittin' worked out, which put a serious rook on ther future and ther boys warn't doin' anythin' agin Providence. Furthermore and particularly ther preacher served out free baccy and didn't pass ther plate. So our meetin' got bigger every Sanday and ther preacher got more influential.

"Fer instance he didn't talk agin ther bar and faro at ther Paradise. No sir! And after meetin' when he watched ther boys saunter into an open switch he didn't git figits. No sir! He'd smile, say they got then habit so bad ther place into a church. Then he'd drop down himself occasionally to see how ther land lay for beginnin' operations.

"Now every time he did that, he got into an argument with Red Harvey. Red Harvey had opposed ther preacher from ther fust, same naturally bein' agin his interests. He felt ther loss of his Sunday mornin' trade and had a weakness fer short handles, meanin' ther preacher, which warn't never invented fer tombstones or public monuments. What he should have put to times and clean ups in his books he charged up to ther preacher and swore some day he'd settle ther bill. But Red Harvey was fer makin' ther best of a losin' game and when he seed how influential ther preacher was he speculated on a junction of interests. Sorter Sky Pilot and Hell Settler Big Combination.

"So one day when ther preacher sauntered in to figure on how many pews ther bar would make, Red begun:

"'Calate you must be crowded up to ther cabin,' says he. .

"'How'd yer git that bright idea,' says ther preacher, eyein' Red, who'd never been to ther meetin's.

"'Well, preacher,' says Red laughin', 'when I see arms and legs stickin' out of a man's door and windows and chimney, I calcate he must be crowded.'

"'So?' says ther preacher. 'Been sacraficin' your room for some other poor cuss. Ruther accommodatin' but come right along, Red Harvey, there's just room for another in thet chimney.' At which ther whole crowd laughed.

"'Thet would seem to put ther liquor on me," says Red, knowin' ther preacher's sore pint. 'And I'm offerin' it,' says he tryin' to git ther preacher in ther ditch.

"'But I offered fust,' says ther preacher. "'Exactly the situation Sunday, you fust then me,' and Red laughed at ther preacher.

"'Sich bein' ther case, we'll let you have a turn now, ther liquor bein' 'on you,' says ther preacher winkin' at ther boys as he sauntered out. And Red Harvey had to set up ther liquor all 'round, which warn't never his idea of "Ther next interview fer formin' ther Big Combination was in private and more to ther pint. Red's proposition was a canvass and crusade of ther whole gulch fer ther purpose of big Sunday meetin's to be hold at the Paradise. Red calated that about three months of that diet would grow wings on every man, woman and child in them parts. "Well you should have heard ther preacher laugh. Sunday was Harvey's big day, but wasn't amountin' to much just then fer ther boys had got to hangin' about ther cabin all day smokin' and swappin' lies, so Red's scheme was too thin.

"'I'll do better than draw trade fer you,'says Grilby, 'I'll buy you out.'

"That's just what he did, too. He took ther building and ther general store took ther stock and good will. Red swore he'd been driv' out of business by a sky pilot, usin' more sentiment that warn't meant fer ther adornment of public institutions, and swore that if he didn't ret quit with ther preacher when ther chance come, you could fill his boots with cactus every mornin' for a week and he'd wear 'em. But strikes had located been north and Red sold out to rush with ther rest of ther boys to ther new fields of fortune.

"Now I helped Grilby turn that saloon into a church. He was as tickled as a kid with a go-cart. Contracted a mortgage to do it proper. Had a big sign packed up from ther valley. which read "Meetin' House of Spruce City' and tacked it up over ther door. But we found we hadn't done enough. One mornin' a prospectin' outfit come in from ther hills, pulled up natural like in front of ther old Paradise and half out of their saddles slid back again. rippin' out a cuss at what stared down at 'em from above ther door.

"That set Grilby to contractin' a second mortgage; paintin' up ther windows and doors; puttin' on a steeple and paintin' ther whole outfit yaller. That put a new look on ther church all right but it put a heavy debt on it besides. People leavin' as fast as they did made that debt look bad. But ther preacher didn't worry. Said when me and him was ther only I said he was a giant and naturally got respect- citerzens, Spruce City would be a respectable "Bout four years after, this yere Twin Leads Silver Mine was discovered and to see outfits pile in here was like oid times. Anythin' with a roof was snapped up quick. Now who should turn up but Red Harvey sot on gettin' into bizness at the old stand. Of course he wanted ther Paradise and smacked his lips at ther new fixin's but Grilby would nave killed himself before lettin' it go,

"Well, Red got on ther trail of those mortgages and inside of a week had put ruther a flimsy look on ther salvation of Spruce City. He had to pay a fancy price and allow three months fer settlement on those mortgages which we thought rather generous, same bein' due two years back.

"Red Harvey seed he had a cinch on ther preacher and started right in to get quits fer past favors. Ruther enjoyed himself at ther preacher's expense. Told people how he was goin' to open ther Meetin' House as a palatial saloon and gamsling hall, which got folks interested and they begun to watch ther game.

"On ther last day of ther three months, Red came up to ther cabin to see ther preacher, a considerable crowd follerin'. Me, ther preacher and Jack Kedham; an old pardner of Grilby's just out from California, was there.

"'Well, preacher,' says Red, 'time's up and bizness is bizness. Hev you got ther dust?' "'Calate I ain't exactly got it to hand, but I've got three days of grace,' says ther preacher cool like.

"'That won't do. Got to have settlement or I'll foreclose. Maybe then,' says Red, nasty like, 'you'll find it agreeable to form that partnership I proposed four years ago.

" 'Seems to me you're pesky sure of somethin' you ain't got yet,' says Grilby, eyeing Red. "'What kin you do to stop my gettin' it?" says Red, sneerin'.

"'Suppose I should shoot yer,' says ther preacher, and the crowd opened up behind Red. "'That's ruther agin your principles,' says Red, scared like.

"'So! Suppose I should burn ther church then,' says ther preacher.

" 'Calate you're playin' fair?' says Red. "'I might do either,' thundered ther preacher, gettin' up on his feet, 'before seein' a house of God desecrated.'

"It was evident that ther crowd was with the preacher from ther lynchin' remarks that was made.

"'I'll give yer them days of grace, up to noon followin' Sunday, but remember thet yer house of God was a saloon for eight years fust,' says Red and struck out, ther atmosphere not bein' good fer his lungs.

"I calate ther preacher was about as broken up over ther prospects of losin' his church as he could be, but as I said there have been some queer runs of luck in these parts.

"Says Kedham from California, when ther crowd had dispersed: 'You say that church was a saloon once?'

"'Yes, sir, ther worst in these parts. I swore I'd make a church out of it and I've done it, says Grilby, ruther discouraged like.

"'For how long was it a saloon?' says Kedham.

"'Eight years,' says I, 'roarin' all ther time,' and I give a few statistics.

"'What yer goin' to do now, Dick,' says Kedham.

"'What I've never done; pass the plate, tomorrow bein' Sabbath,' says ther preacher.

"'No, yer won't' says Kedham. 'You fellers in this gulch don't seem to be up to date. Been in minin' camps all yer lives and know that yer can't handle gold dust without some slippin' away. You've seed colar on every bar you drunk at, on every table yer played at, and in ther cracks of every saloon floor you walked on. What's more you've seed a tipsy miner time and agin throw away a bag of dust with a woop, etcetra, just to make out to ther boys that he had more'n he could carry with comfort. That's all waste-no account, goin' on all ther time and you've never speculated where it all went to. Now when I come out from California ther boys was cleanin' up underneath the old saloons and if facts are as represented. Dick ther mice in your church come pref near rollin' in wealth. Leastways that's what happened in California.'

"Well yer could have put a sack of meal into ther preacher's mouth.

"'Calate we'll go prospectin' down to ther meetin' house,' says he.

"'Calate it'll be a bonanza,' says Kedham gripping ther old man's hand.

"Next mornin' ther congregation found ther preacher breakin' ther Sabbath. Him, me and Kedham had ther floor ripped up, pews and sich piled out ther door and a big heap of dirt scraped together what was full of color. Created quite a sensation, that bonanza. Set everybody to prospectin' fer old saloons you can

"Red Harvey? Oh, I paid him. He swore ther preacher had the whole thing fattening up his sleeve. So did all Wisdom. And as he seed how conducive ther atmosphere was to tar and feathering, and knowin' his constitution couldn't prosper under ther public eye of Spruce City, Red Harvey pulled out about that time fer other parts."

I first met my client where I have met many since, in the county jail where he was detained on a charge of murder in the first degree. Why he chose me, the youngest member of the bar, as his counsel, I could not imagine, and it is to this day a question that I have not fully answered to my own satisfaction. He sent for me to come to the jail, and accompanying his message was a retainer that meant a barrier against the wolf for a long time in those days of my life, so I pocketed any scruples I might have against defending the perpetrator of as cold-blooded a murder as ever was committed along with the retainer, and went down to the jail to advise the prisoner. To advise-yes, that's what I went for, but I didn't do it.

The murder which was the cause of my client's (how proudly I said those words over to myself-"my client") incarceration was apparmurder was.

There had been bad blood between the two men for a long time. The original cause had probably been forgotten by both, but whenever they met there had been angry looks and an occasional word that was not learned at Sun.

an occasional word that was not learned at Sunday school, but no one thought the final result would be what it was.

No one had seen the encounter, so there was no direct evidence. A shot had been heard in the public square, and people running towards the sound had found Walter Carleton lying dead, with a bullet hole in his head, the blood clotting in his hair and a little trickle on the ground. They also saw the prisoner riding as fast as his horse could carry him towards his home, and the postmaster, who was one of the early arrivals, picked up a revolver still warm, with the letters "M. C." engraved on the silver stock.

A coroner's inquest was of course held on the remains. A doctor was called who said death was due to cerebral hemorrhage as the immediate cause, and the remote cause an injury by some instrument or missile violently introduced into the cranial cavity. It might be and from the circumstances he would say it probably transcriptory bell.

from the circumstances he would say it probably was a revolver ball.

No autopsy appeared necessary; the cause of death was apparent, and the doctor's statement was sufficient to establish the cause of death.

Other witnesses testified to seeing the prisoner and that he was the only person in sight when they arrived on the scene. The postmaster produced the revolver which he identified as having been the property of my client, and others also testified to the identity of the weapon—a thirty-eight calibre six-shooter—as the property of Marion Chamberlain, whose initials were engraved on the stock.

others also testified to the inentity of the weapon—a thirty-eight calibre six-shooter—as the property of Marion Chamberlain, whose initials

The coroner's jury spent little time in reaching a conclusion, which was that the deceased came to his death by a revolver bullet shot from a weapon in the hands of Marion Chamberlain, and further declared that Chamberlain was guilty of the death of Walter Carleton, all in due form, of course.

The next thing in the usual course was to capture Chamberlain, and in the mean time the last rites were conducted and Carleton was laid away in the family plot in the cemetery to await the call which will eventually come to all of us, however we have lived and whatever may have been the cause of our dissolution.

Chamberlain, however, seemed to have disappeared. No one had seen him go out of town. It was as if the earth had opened and swallowed him. No trace in any way until the morning after the funeral when he was seen in the center of the public square again, disheveled, dirty and bedraggled as if he had been lying in the woods for a month.

His arrest took place immediately, and then it was he sent for me.

I found Marion Chamberlain in jail and alone, as I expected. He was a man of about thirty years, tall, perfectly set up, and with a face indicating a high degree of natural refinement and culture. The thin upper lip and long mustache indicated long descent in what has been aptly described as the "Brahmin class of New England", and the piercing black eyes betokened a sharpened inspection of his fellowmen.

Little time was spent in conventional intro-men.

Little time was spent in conventional introduction and compliment. The prisoner made some apology for his appearance by saying he had been very busily engaged during the time which had elapsed since the "accident", and further that he had not at present his entire wardrohe at command.

"Now what I want an attorney for," he said, suddenly, "is not to give me any advice nor any of the wise saws that pass current among the pettifoggers who congregate about the court house. What I want is a man to attend to the detail work and simply present the facts to the jury as they will appear—to present them in legal form—the facts will speak for themselves. I am not going to get a lot of perjured testifiers to go on the stand and get all tangled and confused under cross-examination.

"I tell you I didn't kill Carleton. The evidence will come at the proper time. Who did kill him is nothing to me nor to you. We're not the prosecuting attorney. It's his job to find the man who did it. It's my job to tell you where to find the evidence of my innocence, which I will do at the proper time, and your part is to do what you are paid for and nothing more."

We then parted with the understanding that it would not be necessary for man to have and Here was a situation for a "briefless barrister." I had a client. I had money to live on until the time of the trial even if I secured no other business. I had the promise of abundant evidence, and further that I was not expected to degrade myself and prostitute my calling to the subornation of perjury, but beyond these things I had nothing. I had absolutely no case. I revolved the matter in my mind in every conceivable position. There could be no doubt of the fact of the killing. I couldn't see for my life how the defence could introduce a scintilla of evidence in controvertion of what had been adduced before the coroner's jury.

tion of what had been adduced before the coroner's jury.

Even Old Weller's suggestion "Wy warn't they a alibi proved Samivel?" was futile. My client was there in propria persona and his gun still hot and smoking was almost as positive evidence as the testimony of a sight-witness.

Once I went to the jail to see if I could get a suggestion of what was to be done. I was met very cordially by my client who was smoking a fragrant cigar. He offered me one, and pointed suggestively to a bottle of cognac which he had, contrary to all rules and precedents, procured for his own delectation.

He would have shone in society anywhere, and even the dingy walls of the jail seemed to lose a portion of their gloom under the influence of his epigrammatic brilliancy. The prisoner sat in the dock and I stood just outside as the jury was impanelled. I asked him about challenging for cause or peremptorily, but he whispered, "never mind, they look a pretty intelligent lot all around and that's all we want."

Some of the jurymen said they had heard of the case and had formed some opinion, but that they could form an intelligent opinion from the evidence and could reach a just verdict. My memory is that the first twelve men called formed the jury. No one was excused or begin. I will confess to a considerable degree

The prisoner had of course been arraigned previously and the plea "Not Guilty" entered, and now we waited the reading of the bill of indictment and the trial began. The prosecuting attorney was a young man who had a reputation to make and felt it incumbent on him to nake a very long and rhetorical opening to the jury, so it was the hour of the noon recess before the first witness was called.

At this point my strange client seemed for the first time to take an interest in the proceedings. As the jury passed out of the court room to luncheon Chamberlain said: "Mr. Edwards, I have ordered two luncheons sent up here from the hotel and I'd like just another half-hour of your time before the trial goes

I acceded to his request and as we ate our luncheon he inquired when the doctor would probably be put on the stand. I replied probably in about an hour or two after the court came in.

Said he: "On cross examination ask if an autopsy was held, and if not why not. Then move the court that the body be disinterred and a thorough examination had and insist upand a thorough examination had and insist upon that motion. Have the court order the exhumation of Carleton and if it can be done soon enough we shall be ready to put in a defense, if one is needed by the time the state finishes its case."

What now? Was my client going to call on me to prove that his victim died of cholers infantum? or was the alibit to be proven after all? I didn't know.

When the proper point was reached I inquired about the autopsy and the reply being that none had been had, I made some caustic remarks about dereliction of duty, and moved the court for an order of exhumation.

I went to my hotel with a sense of hopeless. I went to my hotel with a sense of hopelessness, relieved in a measure by the unconcern of the prisoner, who seemed buoyed by a hope that puzzled me beyond measure. What was to be gained by the exhumation of the body? My client did not deign to enlighten me but still preserved his sphinx-like silence.

Here was a quandary for the state. The case depended largely on the identification of Chamberlain's pistol and now it seemed to militate against the theory that it was the cause of Carleton's death.

After consulting with the coroner, and a few words with His Honor, the prosecutor announced that he would enter a nollo prosegui nounced that he would enter a nollo proseque but I insisted on a verdict of acquittal which was ordered by the court, and the clerk announced that "If there is no other charge against the prisoner, Marion Chamberlain be discharged from custody."

It was a feeling I could not shake off, but I so far mastered it as to go with Chamberlain to the cafe where he ordered what he called "a full portion of the fatted calf."

As our little feast was drawing to a close, I ventured the question: "Chamberlain, how did you do it?"

Then I took a forty-four cartridge and took out about all the powder so not to have the bullet go too far, and fired that into the same hole, firing through a piece of chamois-skin so not to leave powder marks on the skin and then buried him again. A forty-four bullet won't go into a thirty-eight gun the best you can do, and as I suggested, the state furnished all the evidence required," and handing me an envelope directed to myself with the further words "Your fee," he passed through the front door and was lost to sight in the crowd on the street.

The Madness of Gabriel Juneau.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY "CHESTER LIVINGSTONE."

Copyright, 1901, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher,

ABRIEL Juneau was mad—as you will readily agree when you read that which I have to write-or he would never have done this thing. Something unparalleled in the history of any of the Louisiana parishes, in one of which Gabriel Juneau lived. It happened a long time ago, fifty years, or more, and some people have forgotten it, or but remember it to think of some time late at night, with a shudder. But I know every bit of it just as it happened, for you see I was a lad then, and Gabriel and I often took a drink together, and had a turn at cards. I trust no one will censure me for telling this story of the madness of Gabriel Juneau, for it is not done with malice, and my heart has sent up many a petition that my poor friend's soul might find sweet rest. He was always hotheaded, and his mother was a pure-blooded Castilian, and these people of the south never yoke passion and reason together, from the fact that they will not abide in peace. I have seen the veins on Gabriel's forehead when they looked like a piece of small rope knotted, and his eyes were always bright, whether in calm or anger. His temperament was a little too intense for the uncertain road of love, and it had fared better with him had he never tried "See if it will fit Chamberlain's revolver," I said handing him the weapon.

"It will not. It is too large," he replied after making an unsuccessful attempt.

The prosecuting attorney here objected to evidence of this kind from one who knew little or nothing of fire arms, and was sustained by the court.

He then took the bullet which I insisted it had fared better with him had he never tried to take it. But it is very easy to give advice when the subject is past remedy, so, begging you to be as lenient as may be in your judgment of one no longer living, I shall tell my story without further ado.

Gabriel Juneau was a Creole, his descent being an admixture of French and Spanish. His mother died while he was a suckling; old Gaspar Juneau, his father, passed away one night surrounded by a legion of hydra-headed monstrosities, which his love of strong drink had summoned about him, and Gabriel was letten possession of as fine a cotton plantation as ever whitened a parish. The lad was a moderate drinker himself, for, as I have said, he and I often touched cups after darkness in the tavern at St. Marie. But after the father's unfortunate end the son was more wary of wine, and drank but little, or not at all. So it cannot be said that intemperance led to the misfortune which now came speedily upon him.

Juneau was a thrifty man, a natural husbandman and a kind master, considering his hot blood, which was seldom, I think, below the boiling point. He prospered, and was respected throughout the parish. Adjoining the Juneau plantation was that of Major Bonnie, a southern gentleman of high repute. I think the title he bore was an honorary one, for he had not been living long enough to have seen service in the Revolution, and the Mexican war had not then broken out. But he wore the title gracefully, and it seemed well bestowed. Major Bonnie's family consisted of himself and one daughter, Clarice—and now you have the key to all the trouble. But for fear the lock which holds this story has become rusty from age. I shall continue, and tell you word for word holds this story has become rusty from age. I shall continue, and tell you word for word everything as it happened.

Major Bonnie's lands bordered the Mississippi river, and directly across the stream lay the plantation of George Brownell, as handsome a six-foot planter as ever lit a pipe. And now you have all the persons connected with this story. It must not be supposed that all of these people had lived here since the beginning.

I was born and raised where I still abide. Then old Gaspar Juneau came when I was a little boy. Brownell came from the lower Mississippi, and located across the river ten years later, and only six months before this thing happened which I am going to tell, Major Bonnie came to our parish, bought an undesirable plantation, which by chance adjoined that able plantation, which by chance adjoined that of Gabriel Juneau, and brought with him his daughter, Clarice.

able plantation, which by chance adjoined that of Gabriel Juneau, and brought with him his daughter, Clarice.

It always was a strange thing to me why Gabriel should have loved her. She was beautiful but proud and cold. The beauty of an iceberg, which one admires, but does not care to approach. But he loved her, for all that I cannot make it out, and she liked him well enough, too, for he was a manly fellow, though rather slender in build, until she met Brownell. Then the current of her affection—or, rather, admiration, for that was all it was then—changed, and flowed toward the sturdy planter from across the river. Gabriel and I were like brothers, and I shall never forget the first night he went to this girl's home and found Brownell there. I was sitting on my piazza that evening, smoking a pipe, when suddenly such a clattering broke upon my ears that I rose to my feet, no little concerned as to the cause. But directly I made out a horse and rider speeding up the road in the moonlight at a breakneck pace. They stopped at the gate, and as the man flung himself from the saddle I recognized Gabriel, although the distance was fifty or sixty yards. He dropped his bridle reins over a fence post and came rapidly up the drive, switching at his riding boots viciously, and crunching the gravel under his spurred heel. I knew that something had agitated him to an unusual degree, so I started down the steps to meet him. He took off his hat when within a few feet of me, and his dark skin had turned a bluishgray, while his eyes shone like a cat's. I had never seen him like this. He did not see the hand I held out to him, but stopped before me and let out a string of oaths such as I had never heard.

"Hush, Gabriel," I said quietly, putting my band on his shoulder "mother might hear

hand on his shoulder, "mother might hear you."

He thrust his arm in mine without a word, and drew me down to the gate. Then he told me where he had been and what he had seen. The memory of his fierce and uncontrollable anger is with me as I write, for it made an imprint upon my mind which will never leave it. He had seen Brownell talking to Clarice through the library window and then such a fit of jealousy had come upon him that he was afraid to enter, but had mounted his horse again and ridden to me. I tried to calm him, but nothing which I could say or do could allay in the least his wild, jealous rage. And the next thing I knew he was in the saddle again, and was riding down the road as if pursued by devils. I had grave fears as to what his intentions might be, but judged it best not to follow him. The next morning I learned that he had come home with his horse all atremble and reeking with sweat, and had spent the night pacing his room. And that night marked the beginning of the end.

Gabriel Juneau become completely metamorphosed. He neglected his estate, he became cross and moody, and then of a sudden fell to drinking heavily. Often would I hear him clatter by my home in the dead of night, always riding like a hurricane. I foresaw something dreadful if this kept up, so one night I went to see him. His appearance alarmed me, for his frame was gaunt and bent, his cheeks were great hollows in his face and his eyes had a wild glare. He wouldn't listen to me, but would shift the subject whenever I touched upon his affection for Clarice Bonnie. I tried time and again to remonstrate with him, for my tender feeling for the poor lad was genuine, until he told me, almost roughly, that if I had come to talk on that subject I had better leave him, as his mind was made up and no one could change it. This statement was rather He thrust his arm in mine without a word come to talk on that subject I had better leave him, as his mind was made up and no one could change it. This statement was rather mystifying, but then I could see plainly that he wasn't himself so I left him reluctantly, begging him to come to see me soon. He came one night not long after, and my hand shakes now when I think of it—may the Mother of Heaven have mercy on him!

About a week after this it became generally known throughout the parish that George Brownell and Clarice Bonnie were soon to become man and wife. A chill swept over me when the news was brought to me, and all sorts of unformed fears rose up in my heart. I feared that this would be the last straw for the strained mind of my poor friend, for his peculiar actions were already beginning to excite comment. I had not seen him for a fortnight, and things moved along quietly enough until a week before the wedding. Then Gabriel's head black man come over to me one morning with the news that his master had locked himself up in the house, after having given stringen! the news that his master had locked himself up in the house, after having given stringent orders that he was not to be disturbed. I advised the fellow to leave his master alone and obey orders, but told him furthermore that I would ride over the next day and see what I could do with him. I went, but could not gain admittance to the house. Gabriel talked to me from behind a closed door, and told me that he from behind a closed door, and told me that he would positively see no one until a week had gone; that he was master of that plantation, and would do as he pleased. So there was nothing for me to do but go back home with a heavy heart. The rest of the week passed uneventfully; preparations for the weeding went forward speedily, and Gabriel Juneau never showed his face. The good people around who knew of his hopeless passion pitied him, and said that grief and shame had caused him to seek seclusion. I did not say anything for my mind was not at rest.

I was to be a guest at Major Bonnie's home the night of the wedding, but as I was always rather methodical in my movements, it was a trifle late when I mounted my horse and started down the driveway towards the road. And then a sound greeted my ears which actually caused me to shiver and turn cold all over, altered it was a monlight summer right. caused me to shiver and that could all over, although it was a moonlight, summer night. First a wild, mirthless laugh was borne to me on the breeze, immediately followed by the noise of a horse's rapidly galloping feet. It was the wedding night of Clarice Bonnie, and Gabriel Juneau was abroad once more. At the gate opening onto the nike I stopped, and Gabriel Juneau was abroad once more. At the gate opening onto the pike I stopped, and waited. Directly I saw them thundering up the road, horse and rider flitting through moonlight and shadow. It was indeed Gabriel. He drew his horse up in front of me, and with such suddenness that the beast's hoofs sent a shower of small stones rattling against the roate.

"Ha! friend Auguste!" he shouted, waving his hand in the air, joyously. "You invited me to come to see you, and I am here! But I cannot tarry, for this is my wedding night, and soon my bride's soft arms shall rock me to sleep, and they shall choke the life out of George Brownell and Cl ice Bonnie! Come and see! Come and see!" Then with a crazy laugh ending in a shout, he turned his horse's head and started back towards the Bonnie homestead.

I followed, for his mind was gone I knew, but I did not know what his wild words portended. It was a hard race, but I overtook him before two miles were covered, and though I before two miles were covered, and though I shouted questions into his ear as we sped along, his only answer was a maniac's laughter. Presently we came to where the road forked, one branch leading to the Bonnie plantation, and the other going on towards the river. Here he drew up, and as I reined in also, he urged his horse close to mine and whispered:

"Speed on to the wedding, but don't tell them! I go to summon the bride! Together we shall all float to eternity!"

Then he was gone, his horse headed for Mississippi.

I sat stunned for a moment, then gradually the comprehension of his awful plot came to me. There had been a great deal of rain the past two weeks, the river was high, and I knew that the levee had been strengthened at several weak points that very day with sacks of dirt. This madman was going to make a break in the levee, and let that angry tide pour through the valley where Major Bonnie's home stood!

It was too late to stop him, for he had left me with the speed of lightning. With a groan I dug my spurs into my horse's flanks, and rode to give the alarm. The house was brilliantly lighted when I came in sight of it, and horses and carriages were scattered about the grounds. Through them all I dashed, right up to the front door, and flinging my reins to a frightened negro, I burst into the parlor, and in the midst of the marriage service shouted these words:

"Fly! Fly quickly! Gabriel Juneau is mad, and has broken the levee! Fly to high ground.

and has broken the levee! Fly to high ground, in God's name!" Then was such a turmoil as I have never since Then was such a turmoil as I have never since seen, though my head is white as I write this. Brownell seized his swooning bride with an oath choked in his throat, and bore her bodily from the house. Then followed a mad flight from the oncoming water; we could hear its dull roar drawing nearer as we sped up the road to safety. Not one was overtaken by the flood, but my poor friend alone was lulled to rest in the arms of the bride he had summoned.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY BURTON MCPHAIL

RAMPS had annoyed the train-crews on the B. S. & W. road from the opening of the service. They usually rode under the coaches, making themselves as comfortable as possible between the trucks and the floor of the car, though now and then one rode within the car, hoping in some manner to evade paying his fare, and there is little doubt but that they would have ridden on the cowcatcher, could they have imagined such a thing as not being detected.

The seven o'clock accommodation train pulled out of Hampton on time the night of March 7, 1894. It had been raining all day and there was a slippery rail ahead, and though it had stopped raining, a heavy fog made it impossible to see anything a hundred feet away, so that taken all in all it was an unpleasant night "Caught him on the front platform of the baggage-car, boys," he said, speaking to two baggage-car, boys," he said, speaking to two of the train-crew; "just keep a sharp eye on him until we reach Lancaster and I'll hand him ever to the police.

"Stealing a ride, eh?" he continued, shaking the tramp until the latter's teeth chattered; "did you think we run these trains for the benefit of fellows of your stamp?"

"I L was just going home bose " said the benefit of fellows of your stamp?"

"I—I was just goin' home, boss," said the tramp, pulling himself together, "I thought—"
"Well, you're going home now, all right," interrupted the conductor, "it will seem real homelike down to the county-house."
The brakemen and passengers roared with merriment. The tramp buried himself in his ragged overcoat.
Meanwhile, the train was making slow progress up the long grade leading to Hamilton. Five, ten, fifteen minutes were lost, and as the train started down the grade that ended at the Five, ten, fifteen minutes were lost, and as the train started down the grade that ended at the junction, where the accommodation left the main line, the enginee ret the engine out, well aware that the Lightning Express, seven-thirty out of Hampton, was fast gaining on them, and anxious to get out of the way of the express he urged his engine to the limit.

From time to time a blunderer crops up from among the employees of every railroad. On the seventh of March he turned up at the junction; neglected to turn the switch, and before the engineer could check his train he was pounding over the frogs, still on the main line with ten chances to one in favor of having his train telescoped. Then came the warning whistle of the Lightning Express, and knowing that there was not an instant to be lost, he threw open the throttle and started at express threw open the throttle and started at express speed down the main line, hoping to win in the long race that he knew was before him.

As the train thundered over the switch, the truth dawned on the conductor and brakemen. They knew that the engineer of the express would pay no heed to the red-light signals, now that the junction was passed, as that train had the right of way. They realized that their train would have to contend with a superior engine, but at the same time, their engine was engine, but at the same time, their engine was drawing less than half the number of coaches drawing less than half the number of coaches that the express was laboring under, and it was a much mooted question which would win.

Within the cab of the engine a grim battle was being waged, and the manner in which the fireman shovelled coal into the fire-box would have opened the eyes of many a fireman. Several times the engineer scrawled a message intended for the agent at some station through which they passed, and tying it about a lump of coal, hurled it at the windows of the ticketoffice, but each time it missed the mark, and so the train plunged through the fog, the express gradually cutting down the interval that separated the two trains.

"There is just one thing to be done," said the conductor, the roar of the express sounding unpleasantly close at hand, "get the passengers out of this car and cut it loose from the rest of the train. One of us must stay aboard and manage the brake, and it means death."

The tramp had been listening and understood something of the horror of the situation, and while the men were settling the question in their own minds which should remain, he acted.

"Get into the next car, all of you, and give

"Get into the next car, all of you, and give me a lantern," he said, springing to his feet, "I might as well die tonight as any time; cut the car loose and be lively about it, too; I'll attend to the rest."

Thirty seconds later the car was empty and the conductor was drawing the coupling-pin. As he regained his feet and for an instant held the air-brake connections, he shook hands

As he regained his feet and for an instant held the air-brake connections, he shook hands with the tramp.

"Good-bye, old man," he shouted above the roar of the train, "you're a hero."

On the rear platform the tramp was clutching the brake, ready to ease up the instant the headlight of the express showed itself. He could hear it coming and in less than a minute he made out a luminous spot in the thick bank of fog that hung about the car. For an instant the glow increased and then, like some cyclopean monster, the great mogul engine of the express shot out of the fog, bearing down on the flying car with terrible swiftness. Then the engineer of the express saw the lantern which the tramp was frantically waving, but though he reversed his engine and applied the brakes the entire length of the train, it skidded over the slippery rails until it ploughed its way half through the car.

Somehow the heavy engine managed to keep the irons, and when it finally stopped, the wrecked car was within a hundred feet of Elderton Station.

Buried deep under the splintered timbers of the car, they found the tramp, no, not the tramp, but the hero, and tenderly they bore his crushed form into the station.

"I wasn't hurtin' nobody out there behind the engine," said the poor fellow, looking up into the faces of those that were bending over him, "just thought I'd go home and see the folks; ain't seen 'm for close onto ten years."

Meanwhile the accommodation train had come to a stop two miles down the road, and

"Said something about Parker River," said a physician who chanced to be aboard the express, "then he muttered some such name as Phillips or Phelps; didn't quite catch it."

"Man saved my train and the Lightning Express. He is dying; has people at Parker River; Phillips or Phelps, the name. May live a few hours; what shall we do with him?"

"Special on the way. See that you reach Parker River by midnight."

It does not take an engineer very long to cover twenty miles when he is racing with death and has word from the dispatcher that he has a clear rail ahead. He may be cautious, perhaps nervous, when there is a train-load of passengers behind the tender and there is a doubt about the road, but give him an oppordoubt about the road, but give him an oppor-tunity to let out his engine, the dispatcher backing him with imperative orders to make his best time, and he will make the rails sing. The train had just left Hampton behind when the conductor passed through the half dozen coaches, marching a wretched-looking specimen of humanity to the smoking-car in

There were two hundred and ten miles to be made in the next three hours and twenty minutes, if the superintendent's orders were carried out, a little better than a mile a minute; and the manner in which the engineer and fireman annihilated distance the first half hour, showed that they intended to carry out the order to the letter. At ten o'clock the Special was whirling through Royalston eighty-seven miles away; at eleven o'clock it thundered over the crossing at Rochester, one hundred and forty-eight miles away; and just as the town clock at Parker River was striking for midnight, the Special was pounding over the switches at Parker River Station.

"Tom, can't you speak to your poor mother?" said the wife, following the doctor and conductor as they bore the body into the house. "Tom, just a word!"

"He is going fast," said the physician, as they laid him on the bed in the front chamber,

Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

The play is the thing in these modern days, and the playwriter finds a larger public than the preacher or the author. Henry Arthur Jones is one of the most successful of modern playwriters. His daring plays have brought him literary, artistic and financial suc-

This middle-aged Englishman is a quiet blue eyed unobstrusive individual whose appearance seems radically opposed to the aggressive spirit he shows in his work. Among the plays that have won success on both sides the Atlantic are: Mrs. Dane's Defense, Saints and Sinners, The Case of Rebellious Susan and The Manoeuvers of Jane. Mr. Jones has been accused of attempting to educate the public with his plays. He boldly says there is but one thing worth representing in plays and that is the heart, the soul, the passions, the emotions of men. This his plays do and this it is that has awakened the wrath of the critics. Jones was born in a little village near London and after a brief schooling was forced to commence the struggle of life when he was but thirteen years of age. For five years he fretted under the uncongenial tasks of commercial life. Then a brief visit to a London theater opened a new world to the country lad. From that magic moment, the world of imagination spread before him. For nine years longer he was forced of a match factory for his millionaire brotherto continue the struggle for bread in the work that daily grew more uncongenial. During the time he wrote a novel that was rejected. The substance of the story is in the popular play of the Silver King. In 1878 his first play was acted in London. It had only scant recognition but his next play was a great success and Henry Arthur Jones had "arrived." Wealth and fame have come to the man who believes that the theater may be made the most powerful of educational factors. He said in a recent interview, "Religion, politics, science, education, philosophy are likely to be dealt with on the English stage during the next generation." This is his most earnest thought concerning the future of the stage. It follows that those who believe the stage is merely an amusement or diversion are not taken with Jones' plays. His constituency is the thoughtful cultured portion of the English speaking public. What effect the craze for the dramatization of popular novels will have upon the vogue of playwrights remains to be seen.

A new animal unknown to scientists has been discovered in Central Africa. This strange beast has been named the Okapi. It is the size of a large stag. It has two hoofs like the giraffe. The Okapi has a curiously striped skin something like a zebra, in fact the hind quarters and legs seem like those of the horse or zebra. Its brilliant coloring shading from deep black to cream makes its skin much sought by the natives. The name is the one used by the tribes of Central Africa. Sir Harry Johnson made an unsuccessful expedition into the Congo forests after the animal. The skin and skull of a newly captured Okapi were afterwards sent to him by some Belgian officers who procured the animal from the natives. It is not improbable that the dense forests of the Congo may contain other animals unknown to civilization.

A prominent Hawaiian newspaper makes a bitter review of the three years of American rule in that island and declares that President Dole is responsible for the failure to establish American ideas. It says of him that born under a monarchy, holding office under that monarchy he rebelled against it, not for the purpose of establishing liberty but for the benefit of an oligarchy. This is a specimen of the bitter abuse and criticism that has surrounded Sanford B. Dole ever since he assumed the Direction of the government of Hawaii in 1893. He was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at the time of the overthrow of the monarchy and became president of the provisional government then created. The native ability are recognized the world over. Dr. population of Hawaii have always been bitter Gilman is a graduate of Yale in the class of '52. miration for the plucky Irishman. In many re-against Dole and have also opposed annexation. President Dole was always anxious to have the turbulent island republic declared a part of the United States, and during the seven years from 1893 to 1900, he bent all his energies to that end. He is no tyro in political matters and was able to defeat several schemes for the overthrow of the government that he headed. When the territory was finally annexed, he was appointed as governor. The protests and abuse that had followed him for seven years were intensified by his success and many believe that he would be glad to retire from the position were it not that his enemies might feel that he retreated under fire. President Dole is an old man bat there seems no lessening of the fire and energy that has made him the most prominent figure in Hawaii for many years.

Henry Merwin Shrady is a young man of twentyeight, who has won distinction as a sculptor. The great figures of the moose and the buffalo at the Pan-American exhibition mark his first recognition by artists as one of them. Mr. Shrady is the son of the famous New York physician, and the brother-in-law of Edwin Gould. His family wished him to study medicine, but he disliked the idea and after a course at Columbia he studied law. A severe illness prevented him from immediate practice of his profession and he became the manager in-law. He had all his life had a desire to paint but he received no encouragement and never had an hour's instruction in art in his life. He used the few leisure hours left from business and his holidays in studying painting. His taste turned towards animals and he spent much time in the Zoological Park of New York studying the animals. It was here that he found his models for the moose and the buffalo. He took some of his sketches to a famous New York artist who at once assured him that he would soon make art his profession. His wife sent his painting of their pet dog to the Academy of Design. It was accepted for exhibition and also sold. A painting of pet kittens was also accepted. His sketches for this had been made on bits of paper carried in his pocket while on the way to business. He would stop outside the windows of dealers in cats and sketch the kittens shown. He found it very difficult to paint in the leisure time at his disposal as the artificial light spoiled the coloring. For this reason he attempted sculpture. His first success was a battery going into action. The gun carriage and harness were copied in the Seventh Regiment Armory, while the horses were modeled from his own saddle horse. This was cast in Russian bronze but in small molds. It was this work that caused him to be asked to send models of heroic size to Buffalo. To do this work he rose at half past five in the morning and went to the New Jersey studio of a well-known sculptor. Mr. Shrady's success is a wonderful illustration of the power of genius. With no time and no instructions, his talent forced him to surmount obstacles and become known not as a business nan but as an artist. Mr. Shrady has been invited to exhibit at the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia. His pieces have been war pieces, among them being one called "Saving the Colors" and the "Empty Saddle". There are some practical lessons to be learned from Mr. Shrady's success.

Dr. Daniel Coit Gilman is about to organize the great educational work at Washington that will place the stores of government material in science, art and literature at the disposal of the colleges of the United States. The great work will fulfill the purposes of the university that Washington planned. The work promises a larger field of usefulness than the one held so long and so ably by Dr. Gilman. He ranks as one of the foremost educators of the nation while his profound scholarship and executive

For four years after graduation he pursued his studies at home and abroad. In 1856 he became secretary of the Yale Scientific while the needs of the institution had largely increased. His able manner of dealing with discouraging circumstances stamped him anew as a most efficient and resourceful executive officer. Dr. Gilman was offered the superintendency of the public schools of New York City but declined the position. He has held many public positions, among the most important being his place as a commissioner on the boundary line dispute between Venezuela and British Columbia. Dr. Gilman is a well-known writer on educational topics and has published many books. His selection as Director of the Washington Memorial Institution places him in a most prominent position. The work has a limitless outlook and Dr. Gilman is the man to recognize and develop its possibilities. In 1872 he was called to the presidency of the University of California. In 1875, when Johns Hopkins University was organized, Dr. Gilman was appointed as its president. He held that position until his retirement this year. It was at Johns Hopkins that Dr. Gilman reached the height of his reputation. In an incredibly short time he placed the institution at the head of the great universities in scholarship and influence. During the last years of his presidency Dr. Gilman was obliged to encounter many financial problems, as the securities from which the university derived its income had greatly depreciated in value.

Sir Francis Laking is one of three physicians who have been appointed to care for the physical well-being of King Edward. He was the first physician to accompany the king out of England. He was doubtless chosen on account of his social talents as well as his skill as a practitioner. Sir Francis believes thoroughly in the influence of a cheerful mind and lively manner upon the health. He is a great collector of curios and his first move is to interest his would-be patient in these somewhat novel furnishings of a doctor's office. His son is an acknowledged authority upon old furniture and King Edward has frequently sought his advice in regard to alterations in the royal homes. Sir Francis is very free from general "fads" or peculiar ideas concerning his profession. He does, however, talk much of the conservation of energy and claims the best way to rest is to go to bed. This, he claims, would renew energy much more rapidly than the hurry of a rush to new scenes. Sir Francis is generally esteemed for his lively, interesting conversation which seems as effective as medicine.

This is an age of magnificent giving. Millions are given away annually and the man who gives it is one of the most common features of American life. Nevertheless the personality of the giver is always of interest. Dr. D. K. Parsons of Chicago has given away nearly three millions within the last three years. His gifts are to colleges and educational institutions. He always attaches conditions to his gifts so that a certain sum must be raised before his gift is available. Dr. Parsons refuses to be regarded as a philanthropist and refuses to read the hundreds of begging letters that he receives. He says in explanation of his giving that as an old man who has labored nearly eighty years, he realizes that he could not carry his wealth with him but wishes to see it serve a useful purpose. He then commenced giving his wealth to small colleges that were centers of culture and light in the sections where they were. Dr. Parsons says that he never spent twenty dollars foolishly in his life. He has never attended a horserace or football game and has been inside a theater but once. He declares that he has no benevolence in him and that this can be seen by looking at his face. He has been so annoyed at the publicity given his gifts that hereafter he will distribute his fortune in secret.

Sir Thomas Lipton has won a place in the affections of the American people. The great gold loving-cup that was sent him after Shamrock II. was defeated, was an expression of ad-

I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal and I will send you an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure, for every druggist keeps it. Use it for a month, and if it does what I claim pay your druggist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't, I will pay him myself.

spects the story of Sir Thomas' life reads like a page out of the life of many an American millionaire. Some of this energy was borrowed in America for Sir Thomas did not come to America the first time with a famous racing boat and with a steam vacht with a party of distinguished visitors. He landed here forty years ago as a stowaway in the steerage of a transatlantic liner. He left with one idea in his twelve-year-old head and that was the American methods of hustling. He succeeded in coaxing his father, who was a poor workman in Glasgow, to give him his savings. With the four hundred dollars thus gained he started a little store whose main staple was tea. From this humble beginning has grown a fortune of at least fifty millions. The small proprietor of the small shop is the largest tea grower in Ceylon, a pork packer in Chicago, a manufacturer of ginger ale in Dublin, and a candy maker in London, with warehouses dotted all over the globe and thousands of men in his employ. Five hundred and twenty stores have sprung from that little Glasgow shop. All of the money that Sir Thomas made at first was spent in advertising his wares. His interest in yachting has been an expensive venture. It is estimated that six hundred thousand dollars would no more than cover the expenses connected with the building and racing of Shamrock I. and Shamrock II. One of Sir Thomas's expressions of advice is, "Saving is the first great principle of all success."

Winter Sports in Minnesota.

WRITTEN POR COMPORT

URING the long cold winter months in Minnesota, where the thermometer often registers from 15 degrees to 30 degrees below zero for several weeks at a time. and where the snow plow is in almost daily use, where even the brilliant mid-day sun fails to temper the crisp cold atmosphere, en-thusiasm in out of door sports knows no bounds. After a day of comparatively moderate weather, when a slow rain has gradually changed into a heavy snow storm which has left the entire country

snow storm which has left the entire country round about covered with a firm white crust, the scene is one of unparalleled beauty.

In one of the principal cities of the state, a wide avenue winds in continuous curves for a couple of miles, then extends onward in a straight line to the banks of the famous Mississipni river. Many superb residences line couple of miles, then extends onward in a straight line to the banks of the famous Mississippi river. Many superb residences line this beautiful thoroughfare on either side, real homes, designed for the comfort of their occupants as well as artistic effect, and in which the most cordial hospitality is extended. On looking from the doorstep of one of these attractive houses, early on a winter's morning through arched trees whose snow laden boughs glisten in the bright sunlight, over the snow covered lawns and up the long still avenue as far as the eye can reach, one hesitates to step out, to be the first to sully the perfect purity of the dazzling white expanse, to break the complete stillness which nature has assumed. In an hour or two what a different aspect will be presented. This same stately street will be the center of life and motion, handsome equipages of all descriptions, lined with luxurious furs and drawn by prancing thoroughbreds, will fly along. More modest turnouts will also be seen, numerous cutters and smaller vehicles, and then will come the "bobs", filled with school children, laughing and chattering and "holding on" as the long double-runners skim easily over the frozen snow.

"Bobbing" in the west differs greatly from coasting in the eastern states; in the former locality the bob, often eighteen or twenty feet long, is drawn by horses, and not generally used for sliding down hills, as in New England and New York. To and New York. To those who enjoy out door sports in winter time there are few more enjoyable amuse-ments than a bobbing party of some twelve or fourteen or fourteen guests, all congenial spirits. Let us go back two or three years, and imagine our-seives with such a party, assembled at the home of some charming young hostess, about to their shoulders, for though the Carnival offers many attractions, not the least among these is the excellent skating offered.

Soon a loud gong is heard, and the arrival of the bob is announced. A general exit is quickly made, for all are eager to start. The bob is long and spacious, well cushioned, with a comfortable foot-rail, and a driver's seat in front. Three high-spirited horses stand nervously mawing the ground. made impatient to be off ound, made impatient to be pawing the ground, made impatient to be off by the clear frosty air. There is a great scramble for seats, some preferring to sit side-wise and some astride. Large robes are carried, but not usually needed, for each one is well protected from the cold by extra clothing. Moccasins are generally worn over two or three pairs of heavy woolen hose, unless one antici-pates skating upon arriving at the Carnival. Amid such cheering, blowing of horns, and Amid such cheering, blowing of horns, and ringing of the gong, with one of which a bob is usually provided, the horses start away and the party is soon skimming along at a lightning pace, horses galloping, snow flying, and the air made musical with song and laughter.

A sharp corpor is turned a screen is heard the air made musical with song and laughter. A sharp corner is turned, a scream is heard, and a quick stop is made. Some one leaned the wrong way, and has rolled off. Two or three of the party run back to rescue the unfortunate individual, and find her just rising out of the deep snow, laughing heartily and vigorously brushing her clothes. Soon they have caught up with the others and a fresh start is made.

In a few minutes the more unfrequented streets are reached, where snow drifts are piled high. The road is uncertain here and it is streets are reached, where snow drifts are piled high. The road is uncertain here, and it is considered rather tame if the bob is not over-turned at least once during the trip, for every one enjoys a good tumble into the soft snow, and rarely does an accident prove serious.

Many lights are now seen in the distance, and glittering in the mornings that the Lee Palese rises.

glittering in the moonlight the Ice Palace rises before us from its foundation of snow like a huge berg towering skyward in a northern sea. A closer approach reveals a perfect fairyland. A high stockade built of huge blocks of ice, clear as crystal, with round towers, encloses the whole. The entrance, a broad archway brilliantly illuminated by electric lights, opens invitingly to all comers; those in Carnival cos-tume, that is, in toboggan suits and toques, are admitted free, while the looker on in civilian dress pays a small sum for the privilege of entering.

Once inside one is bewildered. So many attractions offer themselves, a choice is hard to make. Our party divides, three or four hasten to the toboggan chutes and are soon rapidly descending the steep incline and shooting over the well iced track; others have gone into the case and are refreshing the inner man with hot drinks and sandwiches, for the Minnesota air is at all times conducive to good appetites. Four of the girls and men are satisfying their curiosity in regard to the Indians, for several Sioux are encamped here, inside the grounds, and much interest is taken in their tepee or and much interest is taken in their tepee or wigwam. By bending almost to the ground one is able to enter the tepee, and can soon make friends with these good-natured Redmen by offering them a few cigarettes, which courtesy is often returned by the offer of a pipeful of their native tobacco. There are Indians too, fantastically gotten up in paint and feathers, who dance various war dances on an open stage constructed for this purpose.

After fully enjoying the many different en-

After fully enjoying the many different en-tertainments provided by the management, our After fully enjoying the many different entertainments provided by the management, our party gathers together once more, and among the last to leave are the two enthusiastic skaters, who have been content to cut graceful curves on the glassy ice throughout the entire evening without as much as a thought of other amusement. We all now wander to the curling rink and there watch the progress of this interesting Scotch game which has taken such an hold in this country, and whose Minnesota headquarters on Raspberry Island is the scene of many a famous "Bonspeil." After this we visit the hockey game which is going on, and then as our chaperone urges us to the bob again we leave very reluctantly, though knowing that the fun is not yet ended. We take our seats once more and are soon speeding toward the house of our hostess, where a substantial lunch awaits us. Here we find a table most temptingly spread and never are dainties more appreciated. After we have done justice to the delicious repast the bob is again called for, and amid leavetakings and expressions of gratitude to our hostess we take our seats and are driven ed wholly to this amuse-ment and long runs are frequently taken, the long, swing-ing gait being soon acquired. Fort Snelling is often the objective point jective point and it is well worth mile of snow-shoe travel to view this historic place by moonlight, as is often done.

On a high bluff overlooking the river with river with its pictures-queshores and numer-ous islands, Owing perhaps, to the large Swedish and Norwegian element in Minnesota, the use of the Scandinavian ski has become general. Exciting contests in jumping are held, and they are also used for traveling over the deep snow on level ground, where a long pole is used to push one forward in long, swinging strokes.

In jumping matches, the contestants start from the brow of a suitable hill and descend at a rapid pace, the speed increasing every instant. About one third of the way down the slope the "jump" is arranged; a low trestle, or else a lot of faggots covered with snow is placed here to form a level spot from which to leap, and on reaching this point, a spring is made by the runner; for a moment he is seen standing apparently in mid-air, then as he gradually descends, he raises the heels of his skis, and lands easily on the snowy surface. Usually the scends, he raises the heels of his skis, and lands easily on the snowy surface. Usually the jumpers land on both feet at once, though the more skillful performers place one foot before the other. The jumper then continues to shoot the decline with terrific force, and on reaching the bottom by leaning to one side or the other, he curves round and is able to make a full stop. Some phenomenal jumps are made by experts, often from one hundred and ten to one ten to on often from one hundred and ten to one hundred and twenty-five feet in length, and the sport has become very popular and has many devotees.

Of all the winter sports, the most exciting is ice-boating. Here it is that one's nerves are put to their full test; here the adventurous shine, while the timid person appears at a great disadvantage. With the ice as smooth as a mirror, and a good brisk wind blowing, nothing more thrilling can be imagined than to lie on one of these boats, and to feel one'sself being carried along at the rate of a mile a minute. on one of these boats, and to teel one saem being carried along at the rate of a mile a minute, over the glassy surface of some frozen lake. On White Bear Lake, about fifteen miles from St. Paul, this sport is much indulged in. Often one of the many handsome cottages is opened for a day to receive a party from one of opened for a day to receive a party from one of the neighboring cities. Huge fires are built in the great fireplaces, which most of these cottage possess, and after a few trips upon the ice-boat have been made the less enthusiastic of the party return to the house, glad to warm themselves and "talk it over" before starting out again to brave the winter's blast, which is here so keenly felt.

The Carnival generally closes with the storming of the Ice Palace. Words are inadequate to describe this magnificent spectacle. Thousands of dollars are spent in fire-works, and for a time the winter evening is converted into a veritable "Fourth of July." On this occasion, the numerous snow-shoe clubs assemble at some central spot and march in long procession to the Carnival grounds, where they are assigned places. Some are put in a position of defence to guard the palace and some attack it from outside the walls. All carry rockets and Roman candles and at a given signal the storming begins. A volley from the invading party begins the attack, then comes a perfect rain of fire from the defenders, and for many moments a mock battle is carried on, the whole vicinity appearing as if some meteoric shower was descending with terrible fury upon the earth. ing of the Ice Palace. Words are inadequate to earth.

After a short struggle, the defence is apparently abandoned, and the actual storming begins. From all directions, and from every window, door and tower comes such a blaze of illumination that all comparisons lose their significance, and one seems transported to some unknown country, where warring elements no longer contend together, but rather unite, to form a perfect picture of light and beauty.

CONSUMPTION'S SPECTRE

It is generally believed that the way of the consumptive is the way of the child—that the seeds of the malady are transmitted in the blood.

The startling but false spectre of this human scourge has long been erroneously encouraged to stalk abroad in the land and terrify the quaking offspring of its victims.

The veil of mystery has finally been torn from the apparition by industrious, scientific detectives, and the delusion has vanished. Consumption is never inherited.

Consumptive tendency means hereditary weakness which favors the attack of germs from external sources.

The "Bacillus" can attack only those tissues weak from birth or changed by the effects of previous disease.

The battle-cry must be Prevention!

Pyrography.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

YROGRAPHY is one of the few arts or crafts which may correctly be called new. We often speak of anything as being new when it has been known half been known half a century, but this we can trace back no further than a dozen years. To be sure years and years ago as artists, literateurs and all erateurs and all men of public interest at the time used to assemble at the taverns along the public highways, and sit before the huge fireplaces smoking and telling their stories, it was customary often for them to burn some sketch, or trite saying, or autograph with a red hot poker into the wood work around the hearth. From this then, perhaps, arose the term "poker work" often applied to this art of burning wood and leather. In 1884 in Munich, productions of this work were first exhibited, but the process of obtaining such results was kept a secret, known only to a few artists. Immediately all the shop windows displayed an instrument with which they claimed the work was done. A metal style encased in wood similar in appearance to a lead pencil, which was heated over an alcohol lamp, was used for some time after for tracing designs; but this was so tedious and so impera lead pencil, which was heated over an alcohol lamp, was used for some time after for tracing designs; but this was so tedious and so imperfect that it was dispensed with. Shortly after it became known generally that professionals employed a device which doctors used in operating, in which a platinum point or style was kept incandescent by an electric current. Finally benzine was employed as the heating agent, and this brings us to the present instrument in use all over our country, at least, by artists and artisans alike for it does not require the power of originating a design in order to be successful in this art. There are so many good outline drawings one can trace, and much of our best work in this line is done by those who are merely able to reproduce that which artists have drawn. The instrument consists of two one-half inch rubber tubes about a foot and a half long, each extending in opposite directions from a four ounce bottle, tightly corked, containing benzine or gasoline. At the end of one tube (which is operated with the left hand) are two bulbs; the smaller one being squeezed forces air into the larger one which acts as sort of a retort or holder so that the force may be regulated; at the end of the other of a retort or hold regulated; at the end of the other tube (which of course is operated with the right hand) is a long pencil-like ar-rangement with a cork handle and a cork handle and a platinum point. When one is ready to work the JEWEL BOX.

When one is ready to work the point is held over an alcohol lamp or gas burner or even the heat of an ordinary candle will serve to heat red hot this point, all the while squeezing the bulb with the left hand; this forces the gas arising from the benzine along into the point and keeps it in a constant red heat. Then the operator applies the point to his design and an outline is burned just as it would be traced by a pencil and almost as simply; after the design is well worked in, in order to set it off, a background has to be made for it and this is accomplished in various ways; by drawing the point in lines slowly over the surfaces of the wood very close together, heavy ridges are made which produce a very wavy effect. Often wavy lines are appropriate, or dots, produced by touching lightly the surface of the wood with the point of the instrument. All sorts and kinds of backgrounds are effective and interesting and may be worked up by the originality of the operator. A very delicate and pretty finish for the article then, is to color with water-color paints the design in appropriate colors and finally either shellac or wax is applied as a finishing touch. In using the latter a regular prepared floor wax is the proper thing, applied very lightly and polished when dry with a soft brush.

NUT BOWL.

In wood, all kinds of very useful as well as ornamental articles may be made in a very short time and with very little expense. The principal cost is the instrument which is never less than five dollars, and usually just that

Among other things which may be decorated are small boxes, round and square, picture frames, small round chopping trays, pipe racks, book racks, canoe paddles and salad forks and spoons. Out of these things mentioned a few could be made by the operator himself which would lessen the expense of the article. And many beautiful bits of household furniture such as small chairs and stools are very simply made and very easily decorated and may be seen in many of our large furniture stores exhibited as their most delicate and newest bits of craft. The Indians taught us that "poker work" on leather was an art in itself, and skins of all kinds may be crudely decorated to make novel ornaments, such as frames for pictures slashed and burned on the edges, magazine covers and card cases and even book covers form a more delicate but very practical branch of this art. In fact even plush and velvet have been successfully burned. But while every kind of wood may be used (except resinous pine) hard wood is the best. In this, holly, maple and cherry lead, and many wonderful and valuable compositions may be made if one Among other things which may be decorated is only able to select and adapt suitable designs. Many attempts have been made to substitute another cheaper metal for the platinum point now in use but thus far they have been unsuccessful for practical purposes; until this point does make place for one of steel or iron or some inexpensive material the cost of the instrument will be practically the only expense to this very attractive art.

Hall-Marked Plate.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

N books one hundred and two hundred years old we frequently come across the word "plate," in speaking of precious metals. The term is rather confusing to Americans, who call by this name articles plated with silver or gold.

The old meaning was

The old meaning was The old meaning was simply silver money, and was derived from the Spanish word for silver, "plate". Later the term was applied in England to all articles of silver, (with the exception of money.)

(with the exception of money.)

Those of us who are fortunate enough to possess silver articles of old English make have no doubt noticed the devices and marks stamped upon them, but few of us have ever thought of the significance of these marks.

These "hall-marks" as they are called are quite interesting.

Six hundred years ago, the workers in precious metals decided that their wares should be marked in some particular way, in order that their customers might have some guarantee that the goods they bought were genuine. Accordingly they formed a guild, known as Goldsmith's Hall and caused laws to be passed forbidding the sale of silver plate that did not bear the "hall-mark". Goldsmith's Hall flourishes at the present, though the hall-marks have undergone some change.

Wardens were elected by the guild, whose duty it was to pass upon the quality of goods submitted for their inspection.

Before exposing his wares for sale the man-submitted for their inspection.

Before exposing his wares for sale the manufacturer was obliged to send them to Goldsmith's Hall, after stamping each piece with his private mark. Here the goods were assayed and if found of the proper fineness were stamped with the assayer's mark. This was a letter of the alphabet, a different one was used every year, and when the alphabet was exhausted, letters of a different design were used. The wardens then stamped the plate with the mark letters of a different design were used. The wardens then stamped the plate with the mark of the hall, a leopard's head, crowned, and the silver could then legally be put on sale.

If not found up to the standard for fineness, however, the plate was crushed into a shapeless mass and returned to the makers. Severe penalties were imposed for counterfeiting the marks of the Hall.

The marks above described were the only marks of the Hall.

The marks above described were the only ones used on plate until 1696, when a lion's head was substituted for the leopard's head, and also a full-length figure of Brittania. These goods were known as "Brittania standard", and were of a finer quality than the silver plate made before that date. This silver was found too soft for general use, however, and but little was made. The last device added was the head of the reigning sovereign, which has been used since 1784. In 1542 the coinage became very much debased, and the leopard's head lost its significance, which was that the plate was equal in fineness to coin. Accordingly the figure of a lion was added to the hallmarks to signify that the plate was up to the old standard of fineness.

In the United States, until recently, no such precautions in regard to silver plate were taken precautions in regard to silver plate were taken by law, and purchasers were obliged to take the manufacturer's word that their goods were the manufacturer's word that their goods were genuine. Makers stamped their goods "coin" or "sterling," it is true, but no law required this. In 1894 New York State adopted the English standard and made it a misdemeanor to sell silver goods marked "sterling" unless they were 925-1000 fine. Later several of the other states enacted similar laws.

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

"See, Winter comes to rule the varied year," as old Thompson has it in his "Seasons", but the hoary old monarch "rules" as variously as the latitude in which he finds his subjects will allow. No tyrant with laws as unalterable as those of the Medes and Persians is he, but while he holds stern rule over a part of his realm he smiles softly upon the dwellers in other zones. Let us visit, in our first letter, a portion of his domain where snow and ice herald his coming, and call, with the writer of the letter, upon a community of Shakers living there.

upon a community of Shakers living there.

"Almost at the beginning of the White Mountain range in New Hampshire and about twelve miles northeast from Concord, lies the typical country village of Canterbury; and a drive of four miles from the post-office (which in all places is the center of population), over a winding, hilly road, brings one to one of the most prosperous Shaker communities of all those which are scattered over our country. On approaching this little settlement one is tempted to exclaim: "Another white city!" For in truth everything has that spotless appearance that only a coat of whitewash can give. "We were very cordially greeted by one of the 'Sisters', who for the sum of fifty cents conducted us over the establishment, and her primitive 'yea' and 'nay' to our questions, together with her unadorned linen gown and bonnet, for the time being made us feel that we were transported to, at least, some place further away than a New Hampshire village. And while we were going through the yard, to and from the different buildings the following is the bit of information I gleaned concerning this little sect.

But they chose to call themselves 'The United Society of Believers.' Their leader, Ann Lee, a most remarkable woman, came to this country from England in the last part of the eighteenth century, and settled with her few followers near Albany, N.Y., from whence tours were made resulting in the establishment of various Shaker communities throughout the East. Their four pillars of belief are Christian communism, virgin purity, confession of sin (to God before a witness) and separation

"A very interesting argument, doubtless, between my companion and the aforesaid 'Sister' was entshort by our ter' was cut short by our arrival at the 'dairy', where we had nothing less than boundless adless than boundless admiration for the cleanliness and system with which all the work moved together. From there we went to the store-room where the antique furniture, china and every imaginable thing is sold—at a very reasonable price, by the way—and finally we completed our trip by going to the store and buying candied nuts and flagroot, such as only these Shakers can make from their swamps of flag which are just across the street. And as we waved our good-by and drove away we realized that the spirit of communism and happiness for the moment was contagious, and always we 'doff our hats,' so to speak, to the good fellowship and unselfishness of the Shakers."

"Mobile lies thirty-two miles from Fort Morgan, on the Mobile river. Across the river is East Mobile, formerly a marshy spot, but now improved to such an extent that saw-mills, ways for the repair of vessels, wharves, booms and numerous other industries line the shore, while along the wharves of Mobile for miles can be seen vessels loading and unloading. Many of them are engaged in the fruit trade, which also has a large overland traffic, trains of cars loading with fruit filling the side tracks far and near. On our north is Magazine Point, a milling place in front of which vessels from all nations lie in the stream loading with lumber and timber. The small near-by towns of Whistler, Citronelle and Pritchard have also sawmills, distilleries, cotton mills and a basket factory. Spring Hill, with its park and fine scenery, is one of our many attractions, while Oakland, with its fine houses erected by northern people and its grand ancient-modern shell road, shadowed by great trees—magnolia, sweet bay and live oak—and extending for seven miles along the shore of the bay and gulf, dotted all the way by places of amusement, parks, beautiful houses, and bending like a horse shoe as it follows the course of the water, makes a beautiful ride or walk. This is a favorite resort for picnic parties, banqueting parties, encampments of soldier boys and of private parties.

"We are proud of our city, of her energy and pluck, of her wealth and beauty, but we expect greater things of her in the future, when her resources are more fully developed, and we hope the time will soon come when the word 'Greater' will apply as fully to her as it now does to New York."

"A stranger visiting Charleston, S. C., would doubtless observe, among other objects of interest, within one of the city's public squares the figure of a man, from whose body for over a century, the right arm has been absent. It is the statue of William Pitt, the English champion of American rights, and was raised by the grateful people of a struggling colony in commemoration of his heroic efforts to obtain an alleviation of Great Britain's unjust and burdensome taxation. The statue on its western front bears the following inscription:

'In grateful memory of his services to his country in general,
And to America in particular,
The Common House of Assembly of South Carolina Unanimously voted that this statue of The Right Hon. William Pitt, Esq.

come most heartily.

"I am deeply interested in Comfort and would like to join the cousins. I offer them this month a description of a beautiful cave where once I attended a picnic on the Fourth of July. It is called Riverdale Cave, and, by some, the Haunted Cave and the Indian Cave. It is situated on the bank of the Etowah river, is about one mile in extent and looks as if it were intended for inhabitants, having four separate rooms, one of which seems to have been especially made for a ball room while another seems more suitable for a sittingroom, having a stone in one corner that resembles a center table, and another large stone which reminds one of a reclining chair. This last stone is beautifully carved, not so finely finished as a skilled workman would have done it, but wonderful as the work of nature. The walls and floors of the rooms are much smoother than the chair, for they are almost like polished marble. come most heartily.

er than the chair, for they are almost like polished marble.

"There is a rather narrow and rugged passage that extends from the rooms to the river, and in this passage are several large springs the depth of which have never, as yet, been ascertained, so deep are they. There is also in this passage a large rock, from fifteen to twenty feet in height. It is soft, smooth, and of a whitish color, and thousands of people visiting the cavern have inscribed their names on the 'Tall Rock,' as it is called. Some of the dates written there are as far back as 1821. It is said that in olden times many travelers have lost their lives in this passage while seeking shelter from storms, and strangers need a guide through its dark, treacherous mazes.

"Many pleasant picnics and other entertainments have taken place here, but the most beautiful scene which I ever remember here was a wedding which I attended in this cave two years ago. The ballroom was decorated for the marriage in ferns and flowers, and lighted with Japanese lanterns and little candles which were fastened up everywhere among the decorations, making the room so light that it almost seemed like sunlight. Indeed, it was the prettiest and most impressive wedding that I have ever witnessed, and the enjoyment was increased by the sound of a brass band playing marches suitable for the occasion.

"After the ceremony we were conducted to another of the rooms where a table was spread with every luxury that could please the taste. In the afternoon the music began again in the ballroom, and here the guests gathered once more and danced for the remainder of the evening."

MINNIE I. Jones, Cartersville, Ga.

Now let us visit an old Maryland Manor house which, I am sorry to say, is fast dropping to pieces. There is a rather narrow and rugged passage

"The exterior of the house is very imposing. It is a long, low building with a wing at either end. An oak-shaded drive leads to the main entrance, in front of which is a circular lawn. In the center of the lawn are the remains of a once beautiful fountain. The front doors are of English oak and open upon an immense hallway on the opposite side of which are folding doors leading to the ball-room. The walls show traces of elegant paintings and woodwork elaborately carved and stuccoed. From the ballroom two doors of solid mahogany lead into the east and west drawingrooms, and we were told that it was in the latter that John Parke Custis, George Washington's stepson, wooed and won Miss Eleanore Calvert.

The remainder of the first floor is taken up by the kitchen, diningroom, library and storerooms, a wide staircase leading to the second floor where are the rooms which, in the old days, were set apart for the use of Henry Clay, Daniel Webster and General Washington,—all close friends of George Calvert. In one room is a chair used by Clay and also a cedar-lined wardrobe in which, it is said, the famous statesman used to hang his longtailed coat, satin vest and knee breeches. The rooms of Washington and Webster are bare of furniture, and are uninteresting save for their historic associations.

"Next comes the garret—the very name of which suggests mystery. It is reached by a narrow, creaking stair, and in the dim half-light may be seen hair trunks, iron and brass bound chests and boxes of all kinds piled high on every side. What a treat it would be to delve into this store of ancient papers, utensils and clothing, with their memories of the long-ago; but, alas! many of the boxes have been despoiled of their contents by unscrupulous relic hunters, and those which still retain their treasures are kept securely locked. "The house contains about forty rooms, including the wine vaults and storerooms in the cellar, and many extensive house parties have been given in the old mansion by the various colonial and historical clubs of Washington.

"I must not forget to mention the driveway leading from the house to the large, octagonal old barn. This is bordered and over-hung by mock-orange trees, making a veritable 'lovers' lane', and forming one of the most picturesque features of Calvert Place." Frederick L. Newland, Lucinda, Pa.

NE of the most interesting monuments which the country is preserving to the memory of its famous men, is the poet Whittier's home in the village of Amesbury, Massachusetts. he lived there. It is owned by a niece of Whittier, but it is cared for by a company of women called the 'Whittier Home Association,' and visitors are allowed to go all over the house and see the many objects which remind one of the author's life and work. There are two desks in the house, known as the 'old desk,' and the 'new desk,' on one or the other of which nearly all of Whittier's poems were written. There is a stout cane of oak which belonged to Barbara Freitchie, and which after her death was sent as a gift to Whittier. There is the queer old Franklin stove, before whose open front Whittier loved to sit in the winter. This stands in the room called the 'garden room,' because its two windows look out into the garden back of the house. Whittier loved this garden, and in the summer time spent much time there. In it are some great pear trees which the poet set out. In a cupboard in the house is preserved a wooden box which belonged to Whittier's sister, and which is kept just as she left it at her death. A paper is folded neatly in the bottom of the box to make it easy to clean out the dust, I think. There is some printing on the bottom side of the paper. One day I was curious to see what this printing was, and lifting up the contents of the box found out that the paper was a record of premiums awarded at the Merrimac county fair years ago, and that among other successful exhibitors at that time Whittier had taken a premium for pears. This was doubtless fruit from the trees which still flourish in the garden back of the house. Folks who remember the poet say that he would have been more proud of having raised this fruit than of all the poetry he ever wrote.

"Whittier came to this house to live with his mother and sister Elizabeth in 1836. Up to that "Whittier came to this house to live with his mother and sister Elizabeth in 1836. Up to that time they lived on the farm on which he had been born. The house is on Friend Street, so called because the old Quaker Meeting House which Whittier always attended stands there. Probably the house was chosen in part because it was so near to the meeting house. It was small then, but as Whittier's means grew more abundant a room was added here and there until now it is a large house of most irregular plan. There are many pictures in the house, some of them choice family pictures in the house, some of them choice family portraits. Among these are oil portraits of Whittier's mother and sister which hang where they have hung for forty years. During the later years of his life Whittier was sometimes the guest of friends for a long while at a time, but in speaking of his home, once, when away, he said, 'My home is where my mother's picture hangs.'"

MAX BENNETT THRASHER.

And now it is time for us to turn our thoughts to Christmas and its joys and duties, and here is a etter which will help us a bit in that direction. "With the return of these bleak December days come strains of the oft-repeated chorus 'Hosanna in the highest.' Are our heartstrings tuned to this harmony? Are we doing all we can to make this a bright Christmas for every one within our reach? Let us begin with our home and let usyoung and old—reach out to see what can be done this year. Work with children more particularly perhaps than in any other sphere, requires cheerfulness of spirit,—warmth of heart and interest in all their little plans.

"How well we remember the thrill of joy in our youthful hearts at the thought of Christmas. Mothers can help the children to understand the meaning of this feast, relating the story of the Christ-Child, The First Christmas-tree and the Yule-log of England, besides countless other stories of loving kindness at Yuletide.

Singing, too, tends to enliven the season. Even the songs sung by our grandmothers, 'Coaxing Santa', and 'Hang up the Baby's Stocking' are interesting and new to the little tots.

"Many people of intelligence are of the opinion that small gifts will not suffice; that one must give something of great money value or nothing. I believe in giving with the right spirit any token of remembrance available and that happiness will surely result. There is also this bugbear idea, that for whatever we receive at this season we must give in return something exactly as good, or as valuable as the gift received. Is this the idea of giving? I do not think so.

"Sometimes a letter, an invitation to dine, fills the place of a gift; all kindnesses shown are gifts always. Thus we can see that there are various ways of giving and if we can but feel that 'giving enriches the giver' we have the right Christmas spirit and besides making ourselves happy we have been a blessing to others."

and a Christmas gift, given because we feel that we must, or because some one has given to us and we feel that the same value must be returned, or because we wish to curry favor with a person, is not a gift, it is a bargain, and is in direct opposition to all the teachings of the blessed time of Christmas.

The equalizing influences discourage abnormal development and tend to turn out young women well equipped to meet the varied experiences of life that await them outside of college walls. Vassar is one of the few colleges requiring gymnasium training throughout the entire four years' course, while its four hundred acres include miles of gravel walks, an athletic field, a lake for boating and skating, golf links and tennis courts for the prescribed outdoor recreation. Its faculty represents progress and scholarly erudition, its buildings number modern dormitories, its social life covers a wide range with its clubs and societies, its formal and impromptu gayeties.

The ideal beauty of the natural surroundings at Wellesley surpass that of any of the sister colleges, and leaves its impress on the young hearts and minds in training there. It helps to make the scholar for which this institution is noted, also its charitable, sweet-natured girl. The lover of aquatic sports singles out Wellesley which offers such rare opportunities for boating on beautiful Lake Waban under the tutelage of Miss Lucile Eaton Hill, the director of physical culture and an expert oarswoman. A lovely sight comes with Float Day in June when the skilled class and college crews exhibit their good form in rowing to the thousands of spectators who line the shores and give vent of spectators who line the shores and give vent

Life at Smith College with its twelve hun-dred students is supposed to approach nearest to that of the home circle and normal condi-tions as the girls are allowed all the freedom to that of the home circle and normal conditions as the girls are allowed all the freedom possible and encouraged to cultivate social ties among the townspeople, Northampton laying claim to a delightfully refined and literary atmosphere, its public library, Home Culture Club founded by the author, George W. Cable, and its Academy of Music offering advantages in line with the tastes of the girlish collegian. President Seelye to whom much of Smith's success is due, has always advocated the thoroughly womanly woman and frowned upon any aping of the men's colleges. For this reason Smith has never had a college yell or cheer. Health, smart attire, and plenty of diversion both on and off the campus mark existence in this largest of women's colleges, though the studious girl finds a perfect intellectual Eldorado, and the impecunious one's popularity depends entirely upon herself, money not weighing in the balance.

fosters this spirit, being the largest and most adequate among the women's colleges, its workers very much in earnest in their advanced study and scientific research. It is a favored college with girls blessed with this world's goods, and social doings reach heights indicating substantial resources as well as originality. Out-door sports flourish, while practice in the finely appointed gymnasium with big swimming pool is systematic.

The Woman's College of Baltimore attracts by the charm of its cordial and happy atmosphere, its able president, Dr. John F. Goucher, and up to date professors, and fine scheme of buildings, the residence halls arranged with all light, airy bedrooms, elevators, and dining halls on the top floor. Its mild climate holds inducement, also its proximity to Washington, the seat of Federal Government and to the Johns Hopkins University whose splendid medical school is open to women.

The sweet Christian spirit all-pervading at Mount Holyoke always brings there a class of students of lovely character besides fine mental calibre, who do not say much of their possible achievements but whose deeds speak for them.

Mount Holyoke always brings there a class of students of lovely character besides fine mental calibre, who do not say much of their possible achievements but whose deeds speak for them. The wide awake corps of professors keeps the young scholars abreast of the times, while the domestic training, light as it may be, has its influence in fitting them for the home making which is the gladly accepted vocation of so many college bred women. This pioneer seat of learning has steadily advanced since its founding as a seminary by Mary Lyon some sixty-five years ago, and under its new president, Miss Mary E. Woolley, great things are predicted for its near future.

The College for Women of Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, was the first to assume the system of co-ordination in education. That means it has its own corps of professors and instructors, and is an integral part of the university on an equal footing with Adelbert College, the men's branch of Western Reserve, its graduates receiving the same university degree. As the leading woman's college of the West, where co-education reigns supreme, it draws the feminine contingent preferring the action and environment of the separate institution, yet liking the broader outlook of university connection.

connection. Barnard College has recently adopted co-education, having been for a number of years affiliated with Columbia University which confers upon the Barnard girls the Columbian degree, a fact proving a great drawing card. Situated in New York, the students enjoy the cosmopolitan conditions of the huge metropolis, the suburban air of the provincial being quickly rubbed off by such contact. The daily routine in Fiske Hall, the handsome dormitory, combines with studious application, gayety and good cheer, and the benefits of hearing and meeting the variety of distinguished persons constantly drawn to an educational center like Columbia. Radcliffe affiliated with Harvard, and the Women's College with Brown University give to the women students instruction by the respective university teaching staffs, only that Brown allows them the same diploma while Harvard's president countersigns the Radcliffe sheepskin, not granting the regulation Harvard degree. However, it virtually amounts to the same thing. The girls at both these colleges experience a specific phase of the higher education, though now that they are both introducing a touch of dormitory life they will approach ing a touch of dormitory life they will approach nearer the scope of the customary women's college.

NE of the oldest industries and the earliest way of expressing a love of the beautiful and artistic was in the weaving of rugs in the Orient. Nowadays the

The oldest carpetings made of woolen threads on linen strings were found in Egpyt, but whether these were the handiwork of Egyptians or Babylonians is not known.

The Persians are probably the finest rugweavers in the world and their oldest products date to long before Christ. Animals and hunting scenes predominate, with a few floral figures. These rugs were made not by companies, but families. Certain districts, of course, had certain styles, making perhaps the idea carried out in the rug patterns similar in each district, but no two rugs exactly alike, for individuals would express in the pattern some original thought, and possibly some occurrence dividuals would express in the pattern some original thought, and possibly some occurrence or pathetic detail of the rug weaver's life would be worked into the design, as anecdotes are written into a story. Thus an oriental rug maker becomes an artist rather than an artisan. The Khorassan, Kerman, and Feraghan are probably in this class the best, and the deep blue of the old Persian rugs is probably the most valuable characteristic. The artists today are unable to produce this. Some of the products are impaired by analine dyes, also by water-color paints which the cunning Persians employ to temporarily strengthen their coloremploy to temporarily strengthen their color-

The Kerman rug is in texture very valuable. Its design is mostly of men and animals. The Shiraz rug is often woven of undyed camel's hair for a border, which makes the figures in the center stand out in rich contrast to the

The Kurds, a tribe of brigands subject to both Turkey and Persia, make a most beautiful rug, called Kourdistan. It is delicately woven in an impressionist style, perhaps with flowers as a design. They also make a beautiful, soft rug which may be washed over and over again, called Ghileems.

From the cradle of the Turkish race comes the most durable rug, called Khiva or Bokhara, which is used by them as a portiere for their tent. Turkish rugs are rarely seen with any white on them, neither do they weave men or animals into them. Their designs are usually in lines or stripes. They make their own vegetable dyes, raise and card the wool and originate the design.

Probably of all rugs the prayer-rug is most common, peculiar to Mohammedan countries. They are designed with a figure, whereon the faithful kneel, pointing toward Mecca to which their prayers go forth. The devout Mohammedan carries his rug ever with him and usually a compass, so that if he lose his direction in his traveling he may be able thus to point his rug in the right direction and at the hour of prayer, kneel.

The time is arriving when the Orientals may import steam made rugs, and as the wages rise in the East will not spend their time weaving. When this comes about and the manufacture of Persian rugs is a thing of the past, then these works of art will literally be worth twice their weight in gold.

An Odd Newspaper.

ROBABLY the most remarkable publica-tion in the way of a newspaper that the world has ever known was the "Muse His-torique." This unique paper which unique paper which started in 1615 was a weekly and contained the news of the world in rhyme. It was edited by one Jacques Loret, who was also proprietor, business manager, and entire reportorial force.

Every kind of subject was treated by Mons. Loret, and in a style grave or gay to correspond with the nature of item of news. The Muse Historique was published for fifty years, but passed away with its owner, probably because nobody else cared to undertake such a laborious

DISAPPEARANCE OF THE DOLLAR.

Silver money melts from the pocket; paper money is "burned" for this and that, and in either case there is an aching void; disappearing dollars "make the heart sad." But it is different when the dollar disappears from the price of an article of merchandise and it thus becomes that much cheaper than expected and the dollar remains in the pocket. This happy surprise is enjoyed by those who are in the habit of paying $1.00 or $1.25 for copyrighted books when they find they can get the desired volume for nothing. Such is the rule in the notable distribution by the International Association of Newspapers and Authors, now going ciation of Newspapers and Authors, now going on through the Club Subscription Department of COMFORT. See announcement on page 21.

HE two sides of the human face are never exactly alike. There is often a difference in the eyes; one is stronger than the other, is out of line, or, occasionally, is of a different shade. Try it when next you sit for photographs, and have two negatives taken, one for each side of the and then compare the two. Even the face, and then compare the two. Even the mouth and the expression will be found to be different in the two views.

A FEW FACTS ABOUT COMFORT'S FUTURE.

A FEW FACTS ABOUT COMFORT'S FUTURE.

COMFORT now has the largest circulation of any publication of any kind anywhere and its bright title cover page brings sunshine to more American homes every month than any similar publication anywhere. Its interesting short stories and feature departments regularly entertain and amuse more people than any other publication and for the year of 1902, in addition to all that we now present regularly and in order to still further increase our subscription list, we shall run a series of continued stories. These stories will be the best effort of America's most entertaining authors who will be added to Comford's Editorial Staff, thus obtaining the absolute control of their productions for the exclusive presentation to Comfort's readers. The addition of this feature of continued stories will be readily appreciated by the thousands who have read Comfort since its first appearance fourteen years ago and who today as eagerly await the arrival of its monthly issue as ever.

NEW SPECIAL ARTICLES.

NEW SPECIAL ARTICLES.

We shall also present, in addition to the continued stories, as a new feature, many special articles written exclusively for COMFORT by our former brilliant contributors whose way of presenting in attractive, concise and pithy paragraphs such articles as are of current interest to our nation which include accounts of our distinguished citizens, philanthropists, also doings at Washington, as well as new discoveries, international occurrences of note, expositions, and other news matter presented in the form of condensed information.

ORIGINAL COVER DESIGNS.

ORIGINAL COVER DESIGNS.

Comfort was the first magazine in the world to present a monthly change of cover design. This was our original idea and has been maintained as a distinct feature at a large expense and for next year we have already prepared a series of colored half-tone covers and title page pictures which are reproduced from photographs of living subjects who posed exclusively for Comfort's own artist. These beautiful half-tone pictures are each month appropriate to the season: the January cover page presents the face of a beautiful child gazing into space apparently welcoming the New Year while 1902, represented as a youth, bids adieu to 1901 who passes out as an old man. February, the valentine month, has an appropriate half-tone of a cute little miss playing the piano; it is embellished in colors with valentine suggestions. April, the Easter month, presents a handsome child in a hay mow with the proud hen who has laid the Easter Egg; this is embellished with an April shower sketch which is very handsome. June, the month of roses, will be represented by a typical Summer scene and is one of the most attractive cover pages ever offered. We mention these few and you may be assured that the other months in the year are to be treated in a likewise attractive manner. likewise attractive manner.

RENEWALS AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

RENEWALS AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.
At this season of the year we make the most strenuous efforts to add the greatest number of subscribers to our list. Naturally enough we are not only anxious to retain our gigantic circulation and forever maintain that COMFORT has the largest circulation of any periodical published, but add to its already great number of subscribers, and we make every honorable effort to maintain such kindly feeling with our friends and patrons as will induce voluntary renewals and additions. It is customary to present, particularly at the holiday season, an array of Household Goods that are attractive to the eye of our readers and obtain for us a canvassing representative in every town and wise almost as many wants makes it necessary wise almost as many wants makes it necessary to present a most varied assortment of goods, in this way pleasing most any fancy or desire. In this particular issue we present several offers that are entirely new to our readers, and we most anxiously desire that you read every word of these offers carefully as they are entirely different, absolutely new departures, and positively the most liberal it was ever our good fortune to be enabled to make. Our peculiarly fortunate position as buyers in all markets, being extensive users of such a varied line of merchandise, is advantageous to ourselves but more directly to our readers who are enabled to obtain as club rewards the finest kinds of to obtain as club rewards the finest kinds of merchandise for a lesser number of subscribers than it is possible for any other publisher to require.

GREAT PAINTINGS.

GREAT PAINTINGS.

On page 22 of this issue we are able to present small fac-simile pictures of a series of four great master-pieces, the work of the world's celebrated artists. Comfort has been engaged in producing an enormous edition of these four pictures for a long time and we do not hesitate to assert, though it may seem like self-praise, that these four pictures, singly or together, are the best for universal distribution that it is possible to obtain. The subjects are varied and each one will be appreciated and it would seem that everybody would want the entire set at once and that every family would frame one or more as they certainly are attractive and ornamental. These pictures are reproduced by the most modern method known; there is even a detail in the make of the paper on which these pictures are produced that is entirely new. This feature is the canvas-like surface of that portion of the paper on which the picture is printed, giving the same effect to the eye as would a genuine oil painting on canvas. It is something never before used and its appearance in the group of Comfort's Art Work is exclusively controlled by us. With each picture we give a short account of its painter, also description of the subject which it will not be amiss to read as these little stories better make the subject understood. We also describe their size and other details in connection with the offer for subscription work and renewals to introduce the pictures. If you are interested in your home or want appropriate Christmas gifts at a small cost, it should be your first duty to thoroughly read everything we say in connection with the pictures and the matter of obtaining them for nothing.

SPECIAL CLUB OFFERS.

GREAT BOOK OFFERS.

COMFORT recently co-operated its interests with the International Association of Publishers and Authors which obtained for a limited time the privilege of using for the exclusive benefit of its readers and people generally re-mote from large department stores an edition of four million books embracing the works of four million books embracing the works of forty authors, each of whom produce one volume. These books are absolutely new copyright stories, not reproductions from old expired copyright work, but are books that are being sold at $1.00, $1.25, and $1.50 per copy, exactly the same in every particular, in the regular book stores and it is to acquaint the world with the names of these authors and through this publicity create a demand for their future efforts. As the greater number of these contributors wish to be known to what we call "bookworms" you will see that it is to their advantage to waive all their royalties and other profits as the future editions of their their advantage to waive all their royalties and other profits as the future editions of their books will be sought at most any price. A full description of the books, binding and our distributing plan appears on another page of this issue and is without question an unprecedented opportunity, as you are allowed to return the first book which is sent on inspection if it does not prove to be all that we represent it.

We expect as a result of the improvements to obtain sufficient revenue to even do more than we have planned and appropriated for which happy result will without doubt reward our endeavors and you will receive a magazine equal in value to those whose subscription rate is $1.00 per year or 10c. per copy.

You will notice we give in this issue an unlimited assortment of club gifts for home and personal use for the very smallest number of subscribers. All expiring names will be removed if not renewed within thirty days.

TO OUR OLD AND NEW FRIENDS.

We hope you have always found pleasure and profit in the columns of COMFORT as a regular reader, and if you are a trial subscriber we hope you have been pleased with the measure we have given in the past and we are frank enough to ask you, plainly, to please renew your subscription this month as we cannot promise to continue the offers here given indefinitely and we would like you to shore in the good things

EDITORIAL CHATS.

The opening of a new Congress is always interesting to the American people. December is the time when Washington really wakes up and the wheels of government begin to turn.

The Society of American Women in London is a comparatively new club but one that has done much to convince the English people of the all around ability of American women. Ambassador Choate declared that they had recently held the most notable function ever held

There is a touch of savagery in our wholesale indiscriminating admiration of what we consider bravery. Unfortunately we are apt to consider the man brave who is only reckless. There are many people who are not candid enough or brave enough to say "I am afraid." The man who says that, feels it, but goes on, unhesitating to perform the act that his reason tells him is necessary as the really brave man. He has conquered himself and that is an act that even the best sometimes fail to accomplish.

The journalists of America are to have a home all to themselves. This is not a charity but a place where the worker who has kept the world supplied with the facts of the daily battle may rest. It is located in New Orange, a suburb of New York. The newspaper people aim to have one of the finest libraries in the world at this home; to have rooms where the busy ones may work in quiet, and rooms where those whose usefulness is over may be comfortable. It is the only place of its kind in the world and will supply a long felt need.

The parlor car travel during the holiday season is said to be a good thermometer of the financial condition of the country. This year the demand for luxurious accommodations exceeds the limit of the possible supply. Every one is rich enough to go home and to go in good style. The man or woman may economize all the year but when the face is turned toward the old home, human nature asserts itself. We wish to show in that most difficult of lands, our "ain countrie", that the world beyond the hills has dealt kindly with us. For this reason all the parlor car seats and sleepers will be filled with those seeking holiday joys.

The American people have been so busy in welcoming the coming, speeding the parting Irish guest who came after "the cup" that they seem to have forgotten an old trait of human nature. We have hardly had time to congratulate Columbia. In fact all the bouquets and ribboned wreaths have been for the defeated. We have all been like Whittier's little heroine who was 'sorry that I spelt the word, I hate to go above you, because, the brown eyes lower fell, because you see I love." This may be courtesy but it is certainly not sport. The surest way to rob all future contests for the cup of any element of sport or excitement is to put ourselves in the attitude of sighing for defeat.

An institute for the study of the Russian language has been established in London. We have established a chair for the study of the Chinese language. Both those difficult languages are now necessary in a thorough commercial education. The future history-making events may be looked for through the Slav and the Mongolian. It is these two races that are the only ones that are not traced back to The Celt, the Tenton and the glo-Saxon have dominated the history of the world. It is a significant fact when the aggressive commercialism of the Anglo-Saxon forces him to endeavor to acquire the languages of the two great nations that seem to be relics of outgrown ideas of government.

Andrew Carnegie has developed and extended the library craze within the last decade. Libraries, books, authors and readers have increased at a rate that is simply phenomenal. The more conservative portion of the people are led to wonder if a thinking public is keeping pace with a reading public. The passion for reading seems to have broken all bounds and whether on street cars or traveling, in city, town or lonely farmhouse the average American seems absorbed in a newspaper, magazine or book. Language may have been given to many to conceal his thoughts, as the wicked and witty old Frenchman asserted, but the written language seems to be developing. has the largest circulation of any periodical published, but add to its already great number of subscribers, and we make every honorable effort to maintain such kindly feeling with our friends and patrons as will induce voluntary renewals and additions. A representative of our government has just gone to France to examine the details of mush-A representative of our government has just gone to France to examine the details of mushroom culture, with the idea of developing the industry in the United States. There is a growing interest and knowledge of the wild edible fungi of America but it is still too limited to be of any great practical value to the poorer people of the country. The French peasant understands fully the food value of mushrooms and is taught to know the edible varieties. With us the taste for mushrooms as a food is confined almost entirely to cities, and the markets are furnished from the mushrooms grown in cellars. A few women have succeeded in establishing a business through the culture of a few varieties. The demand is so far in excess of the supply that the price is still high enough to class mushrooms as a luxury. This, in spite of the fact that the process and growth is comparatively inexpensive. It is hoped that this visit to France may increase our knowledge so that the growth of mushrooms may become a considerable industry. The use of those that grow wild should be taught in the schools. The characteristics of certain edible varieties are so marked that a knowledge of the mushroom is quickly obtained. The poisonous kind is yet more easily distinguished. Any attempt to extend a knowledge of this delicious food should be encouraged.

Men seem to have awakened to an overwhelm-ing discontent with the way the Lord has separated the land from the water on this earth. separated the land from the water on this earth. The commerce of today is upsetting political conditions and is no longer content with physical ones. The English have never been able to bring Ireland near to England politically but now there is a demand for physical nearness. A tunnel is proposed which shall connect Scotland and Ireland at a point where the two coasts lie within about twenty-five miles of each other. It is claimed that the tunnel could be constructed in twelve years and at a cost not to exceed $50,000,000. It is hoped that the Isthmian canal which shall connect the Atlantic and the Pacific may be constructed in less than and the Pacific may be constructed in less than that time. A list of the canals, tunnels and dams that are altering the physical appearance dams that are altering the physical suppearance of the earth would awaken wonder at the vast undertakings that have sprung from the necessities of man's life upon the earth. Man may confidently be said to have conquered his environment. When he has tunneled and dug and tore up mother earth until she will have to establish her identity by means of the old nursery rhyme, "It I be I, as I hopes I be," he may turn his attention to reaching other worlds. The airship that has sailed around the Eiffel Tower has certainly proven that the a, b, c's of aerial navigation have been successfully conquered. If man overcomes the air with the same advance he has shown in dealing with the limitation that the physical surface of the earth has endeavored to impose, he will be visiting Mars and the Moon before the end of the century.

The discussion over the possibilities of a change in the tenor of government because of a change in the personality of our chief executive is most prevalent just at the opening of the new congress. The general public and the press seem to ignore one important fact. The choice of a Speaker of the House is far more important in its possible effect on legislation than the fact that President Roosevelt instead of President McKinley stands at the head of the nation. The unwritten authority which precedent has given to the Speaker of the House of Representatives makes him in many ways the most powerful factor in our law making. He is conceded to be next to the President in influence and he is actually in possession of more direct power. This power of the Speaker was probably not intended by the makers of the constitution. It is not even necessary by the provisions of that document, that the Speaker be a member of the House. The constitution states that the House may appoint its speaker and other officers. The "other officers" are never members of the House but custom has decreed that the Speaker shall be and the same custom has thrown into the hands of this one man an almost absolute con-The discussion over the possibilities of a but custom has decreed that the Speaker shall be and the same custom has thrown into the hands of this one man an almost absolute control over the possible legislation of the nation. The House is divided into at least forty committees. All of the topics likely to be subjects for legislation are given a committee. The Speaker appoints these committees. They must be bi-partisan but the party in power always has the majority in all important committees. If the Speaker has any personal views concerning a law it is easy for him to choose a committee that will be in sympathy with him. All bills that come before the House must first pass through the hands of a committee in orhas that come before the House must hist pass through the hands of a committee in order to gain a hearing before the House as a whole. The power thus given the Speaker is one of vast importance and he can literally prevent the policy of any President from being carried out by the process of committee making. ing. The tendency in modern government is toward the gain of power by the legislature at the expense of the executive authority, and our government furnishes the most marked illustration.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

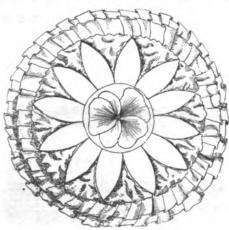

HE hope of being able to give our readers something novel for Christ-mas ideas has been with us constantly, but we find it early for the sale of Christmas goods, as they are not put on sale until a month later than COMFORT goes to press, so we are reduced to two really new ideas in the fancy work in the fancy work line. But if our readers are inclined to do things in burnt wood and leather, another field is opened up to them in Pyrography. We give an article with illustrations in another column on this new and delightful art.

Now for our own illustrations. The sofa pillow is very handsome and very elaborate,—not such a one as you would use in the Den, but for so-called "parlor" use, or, more properly speaking, decoration.

There are several designs of this cushion, among them being the holly wreath, the La France rose, the violets, nasturtiums, wild roses, and pansies. The cushions are round. There are front and back pieces of linen, cut as shown in our illustration, the edges of the points being bound in green braid. On the piece designed for the front, the center is embroidered in whatever design is chosen. We chose the pansy design, working the flower in the purple silks. The China silk used in making the cushion up is of two shades of purple, light and diark. A ruffle or broad puff of each shade is cushion up is of two shades of purple, light and dark. A ruffle or broad puff of each shade is put around the edge of the cushion, the outer one being wider than the inner one. Then between the points of the linen center, pieces of the silk are set in, very full, so that they puff out between the points. It is a difficult cushion to make, but one is more than repaid for the amount of work put into it, for it is so odd and amount of work put into it, for it is so odd and striking.

Those decorated with violets are made up either with violet silk or with green silk. The rose design is made up with pink silk, the holly with red silk, and the nasturtium with deep orange and yellow silks. These cushions retail for $13.50, all made. The front and back can be bought for one dollar, and it takes a dollar's worth of silk to embroider any one of the designs. Then there is the cost of the pillow and the China silk besides.

What we call a "comfortable" pen wiper is our other offering, by which we mean one easily handled without soiling the hands, and one not easily tost.

The foundation is a round stick about as large as a pencil, and four inches long. This is wound with two colors of narrow satin ribbon in the manner shown, forming squares. The ribbon ends in a flat rosette on the end of the stick, which is the beginning of the base of the pen wiper. Then fitteen leaves measuring about two and one-half inches long by one and one-half inches wide are cut from soft chamois skin and pinked around the edges. These leaves are sewed to the stick in such a manner leaves are sewed to the stick in such a manner as to spread out flat, to allow the pen wiper to stand up. They are sewed on ev-enly around the stick, fasten in g to the ribbon with which the stick is wound. To cover where the top and last row of leaves is fastened to the stick, a piece of the ribbon is tied around the stick and finished with

The cost of such a pen wiper is thirty-eight cents, but one could make half a dozen for that a dozen for that price, as only one skin would be needed and about one yard of each color of ribbon, for each pen wiper. The ribbon bought by the piece would bring the cost down, if several were to be made. Some of those we saw were made with yellow and purple ribbon, some with gold and black and some with pink and green.

Now for some answers to questions by our readers. E. S. M. of South Bend wants to know how to wash eider down quilts. Make a good lather of soap jelly (boiled soap) and warm water, and add to it a little borax or ammonia.

Into this put the quilt and knead it about; repeat the process in fresh suds if very soiled. Then rinse all the soap out with two or three changes of water, shake and hang out to dry. During the drying and afterward, shake the quilt well, and it will be as full looking and soft as when new the soft as when new the source. soft as when new.

Another anxious inquirer wants to know how to develop her neck. To fill the troublesome hollows on each side of the collar bone a system of deep breathing is invaluable. Take a deep breath, hold it as long as possible, and then exhale it very slowly. Repeat this ten times. Do this twice a day. As it is absolutely essential that the muscles should be developed, the following exercises must become a part of one's lowing exercises must become a part of one's Slowly bend the head forward till the chin touches the neck. Then raise it very gradually. Slowly bend the head backwards and raise it

All these movements should be repeated ten or fifteen times, and when you have done this you will feel that every muscle in your throat and neck is aching. Then bathe the throat and neck in hot water. Dry thoroughly, and well massage in any good cold cream, rubbing it in with the tips of the fingers till the skin has absorbed it all, and your neck is in a glow. With a soft rag or towel wipe off any cream that may remain. The massaging should be done with a rotary motion.

Now dampen a soft rag or sponge, moisten

Now dampen a soft rag or sponge, moisten the throat and neck with benzoin and rosewater, which is a skin tonic, and helps to close the pores and so prevents dirt from entering. In the morning wash with warm water and a good soap or almond meal, rinsing and thoroughly and bathing afterward with the very coldest water you can get. It is also well to add lavender water or toilet vinegar to the water.

Then, before finishing dressing, go through the exercise in the same way as you did the previous evening.

Chinese Printing.

WRITTEN FOR COMPORT.

HOUGH the art of printing as practiced by us now was not discovered until the fifteenth century, the Chinese have been making books for a considerably longer period. Foong Taow, so the account reads, who was the Chinese have been making books for a considerably longer period. Foong Taow, so the account reads, who was the Chinese have been inventor of their minister of state somewhere back in the tenth century, is said to be the inventor of their method of printing. He was greatly hindered in the discharge of his duties because he could not secure good accurate copies of his writings. After many trials and failures he hit upon the plan of dampening a sheet of writing. This was pressed upon a smooth piece of wood and a transfer taken. He then cut away all the parts of the wood that were not inked by the writing, leaving the lines in relief. These lines were inked, a paper pressed upon them, and thus an impression was taken. In 1041 an ingenious Chinese blacksmith named Pi-Ching invented types made of porcelain. These were all sorts of shapes and sizes, but were arranged in lines and then pressed into a yielding composition until they were of a uniform height. As the composition hardened they were held firmly in position. After use the composition base was melted, and the porcelain types were cleaned and put away. Pi-Ching, however, was the only one able to use this method of bookmaking, which died with him.

The present Chinese method of printing is practically the same as that used by Foong Taow. The printer takes a block of pear-wood large enough to hold two pages of the book to be printed. The blocks, after being planed and squared are sized with a thick solution of rice, and when this is hard the block is ready for the engraver. The writing or design is transferred from the sheet of paper upon which it is drawn to the block. The engraver then cuts away the surface of the blocks everywhere but where the lines occur, thus leaving them in relief. If a mistake is made or the tool slips a hole is bored in the bloc HOUGH the art of

A daily newspaper, known as the Pekin Gazette, has been printed in China for centuries. It consists chiefly of the orders of the emperor and the proceedings and papers of his general council. A composition of hard wax is used instead of wood for the pages of the Gazette, as this substance is of course easier to engrave.

After the block is finished it is ready for the After the block is finished it is ready for the printer. No press is used. Instead the operator has a double brush, one end of which is used for inking while the other end is dry. The block is first brushed over lightly with ink and a sheet of thin paper is laid over it. The operator then brushes the back of the paper with the dry side of the brush, which causes the ink on the block to transfer to the paper. The paper is then folded so that the printed pages come opposite one another and thus two pages of the book are made. Two thousand sheets a day is about what one man can do. When the sheets are all printed and folded back the ends at the back of the book are stitched together, the fold coming in front. This of course is exactly the reverse of our method. The first Chinese books were printed upon cloth, cotton or silk, and in order to keep the leaves from fraying the method was adopted of leaving this fold in front.

One of the principal reasons why the Chinese have never resorted to printing by means of moveable types is that it would be almost impossible on account of the peculiarities of the language. In Chinese every word is represented by a different character, and as the words in the Chinese vocabulary are estimated to be at least eighty thousand in number the difficulties the Chinese vocabulary are estimated to be at least eighty thousand in number the difficulties are very apparent. In order to provide for all these characters five hundred times as much room would be required as is occupied in the storing of an English alphabet, which requires one hundred and fifty-two different compartments. ments.

had a collection of forty-three thousand Chinese characters, and other offices have had enough made to print special books; but a complete outfit of Chinese letters has never yet been made.

In spite of the seeming slowness and clumsiness of Chinese printing methods, books in China are very cheap. It is possible there to buy a book for eight or ten cents equal in size to books sold in America for ten times that amount. Certainly if the Chinese have not advanced it is not because their printing matter is expensive or scarce, but rather, no doubt, because of the contents of their hooks.

he has had the finest automobile in the world made for him. A correspondent says:

"I was fortunate in finding the manager of M. Serpollett's establishment, and he kindly told me one or two things regarding the most important order the firm has yet received. The vehicle now being made for His Majesty will be a nine-horse-power Gardner-Serpollett phaeton, light and elegant, and capable, should the king be in a hurry, of getting over the ground at the rate of fifty miles an hour. It is a slightly reduced model of the twelve-horse-power carriage with which M. Serpollett at Nice did one hundred and two kilometres (over sixty-three miles) in an hour, the greatest speed yet attained by an automobile. It is to be the finest 'voiture de luxe' ever constructed. It will have accommodations for four persons, and the motive power will be supplied by paraffine. The motion of the car will be smoother than that of an electric vehicle; it will be noiseless and odorless, and there will be a total absence of vibration. 'In fact,' said the manager, 'it is just as if one were seated in an arm chair, a circumstance that has led to the Serpolletts being called by our customers "les Silencieuses".'

"Nearly all the metal parts of the carriage are of the finest steel, and the body of the vehicle painted red. It is an open carriage, but so constructed that it can be closed in bad weather, and cost about six hundred or six hundred and fifty pounds. His Majesty takes a great interest in his new motor-car, and gave personal directions concerning the plans of the royal automobile."

teeth to them to catch the ground, it will be a success.

What a difference between the bike of 1882 and the bike of 1902! The now obsolete Columbia Light Roadster marked the era between 1882 and the advent of the Safety. Every essential of the perfection of its type was combined in this machine, and not a few of the older devotees of the sport who have followed the bicycle through all its fluctuations associate the "good old Ordinary" with their most pleasant reminiscences. From its inception until its final capitulation in competition with the unpretentious safety, such improvements as were made from year to year were merely in the line of slight modifications in weight. If we acknowledge that the high grade models of the coming year are as near perfection as is possible to the type, and with an unimportant reservation affecting slight details the quality between the two is emphasized.

Perhaps the best example of a modern bicycle to choose as the parent of our matured idea was the safety of 1889 with spring front fork and cushion tire.

In order that the chauffeur might be in keeping with the size of the machine, Chiquita secured a negro dwarf and had him taught the art of running the smallest "auto" ever built.

A novelty in the line of automobiles is to be seen in the accompanying cut which is a picture of a steam-driven automobile designed and built by George Washington, a resident of Chicago. A paper of that city describes the strange vehicle as follows:

strange vehicle as follows:

It is a traveling van propelled by a forty horse-power gasoline motor, and is intended for its owner and his wife during their wanderings about the country. An old street car has been rebuilt for the body of the house, to which are added an observation and operating platform at the front end, surrounded by large windows, and a porch in the rear. The machinery is mounted on a heavy steel frame, the whole weighing about four tons. Although no great success attended Mr. Washington's efforts to navigate in the new craft he believes

Progress is comparative, and it would be rank injustice to that beautiful little machine which can be seen any pleasant day in spring led from the store by its proud owner, or carried from curb to curb to avoid soiling its clean gray tires, to trace its genealogy to a crude and clumsy hobby horse, sans pedals and cranks, which men bestrode a century ago.

In a chain-driven bicycle this strain is necessarily upoyen and in a sense intermittent and hos uneven and in a sense intermittent, and has the effect of a series of blows. HERE are so many inquiries from our readers for menus for luncheons that will not cost a great deal, that we are going to answer them by giving one them by giving one for six guests, at a cost of four dollars and a half. It is so hard to tell what people consider as costing "a great deal," that we hope this will fit in with the ideas and wishes of our insome of our in-quirers, and if more elaborate and more elaborate and expensive men us are required we shall be glad to give them. Of course this is a timely menu,—one to be used in the game season. When used at another time of the year croquettes could be substituted for the bird course.

Regarding, also, the Concord cream. This is the grape season also, and later or earlier it would be difficult to procure unfermented grape juice,—so cream or ice of another flavor would have to be served. For this reason, it is often difficult to give a luncheon or dinner menu which is suitable for all seasons and for all parts of this country, which has such a varied climate and therefore such varied fruits and vegetables. Our readers in the extreme south and north will, of course, take these things into consideration when reading our suggestions and recipes. and recipes.

CREAM OF SCALLOP SOUP.

Wash one quart scallops, reserve one-half cup, and finely chop remainder. Add chopped scallops to one quart milk, and cook slowly twenty minutes with two cloves, a bit of bayleat, one-fourth teaspoon peppercorns, one tablespoon chopped onion, and two tablespoons butter. Strain and thicken with three tablespoons butter and one-fourth cup flour cooked together. Parboil one-half cup scallops, add to soup and serve with dinner biscuits or oysterettes.

Separate cold boiled halibut in flakes, moisten with one cup thick white sauce made of three tablespoons butter, one-third cup flour and one cup scalded milk; season highly with salt, cayenne and lemon juice. Cool, shape in form of fishes, dip in crumbs, egg, and again in crumbs, and fry in deep fat. Drain on brown paper and serve with HOLLANDAISE SAUCE. Wash one-third cup butter and divide into three parts. Put one piece in a sauce-pan with one-half tablespoon vinegar and the yolks of two eggs. Cook over hot water until butter begins to melt, then add second piece, and when that is melted, third piece. Remove from range as soon as thickened and season with one-fourth teaspoon salt, a few grains cavenne and tomato catsup.

cayenne and tomato catsup.

We have already explained how to wash butter.

Parboil one pair sweetbreads, cool and cut in small pieces; there should be one cup. Melt two tablespoons butter, add two tablespoons flour and one-half cup chicken stock. As soon as boiling point is reached add one-fourth cup heavy cream, the sweetbread and one-fourth cup mushrooms. Season with salt, pepper and Worcestershire sauce. Remove a slice from the stem end of six peppers, remove seeds and parboil peppers fifteen minutes. Cool, fill, cover with buttered crumbs and bake in a hot oven until crumbs are brown. Serve with or SWEETBREAD IN PEPPERS.

without a sauce. If sweetbreads are not obtainable, use the white meat of boiled chicken cut in small pieces.

Of course everyone knows what a Canape is, but for fear some may not, and therefore would not understand the following recipe, we will say that a Canape is simply a piece of toast up-on which has been piled and browned some on which has been plied and browned some sort of a mixture of minced meat, fish or fowl, with seasoning. Canapes are served at evening suppers where the chafing dish is used, though not made in the chafing dish. They are also served in a course luncheon with nothing but the mixture on top. In the present case this course is made more hearty by adding as it makes such a desirable garnish for so many kinds of salad.

Of course you all know that French dressing is a mixture of one-half teaspoon salt, one-fourth teaspoon paprika, two tablespoons vine-gar and four tablespoons olive oil.

CONCORD CREAM.

Mix one pint cream, one and one-fourth cups unfermented grape juice and one-third cup sugar. Add lemon or fresh lime juice to taste. Freeze and serve, garnished with whipped cream sprinkled with finely-chopped pistachio nuts.

This cream may be served as illustrated, in a small straight glass, which stands on a green grape leaf in a plate, or may be served on a flat dish very daintily. Take the cream out of the freezer with a large spoon, and have it look like the bowl of the spoon as it lies on the plate. Then fill a pastry bag with whipped cream which has been sweetened and flavored with one-third teaspoon lemon and two-thirds teaspoon vanilla flavoring. Cover the cream teaspoon vanilla flavoring. peculiarity about the chocolate trade is the fact that it is more expensive in South America, where it is produced, than in any other place. In South America the retail price for the better grades averages about it per pound, while in Italy, France, England and in the United States the better grades sell at a much lower price. TABLE Armenian Needlework Designs So Closely Followed as to Defy Detection. Read How You May Get this Splendid Japanese Gift for Your Own Home. The most gifted race in the world with the needle are the Orientals. For centuries the rich and varied designs worked by their hands have been the admiration and delight of overs of art. A few years ago an American was fortunate enough to invent machinery that would reproduce these rich designs of embossed embroidery and needlework, even to the delicate films of gold-thread work. Still more curious the Japanese obtained plans and made similar machinery, so that they have the addition of "cheap labor" to Yankee machinery. In this way the most delicate Armenian and Turkish needlework is imitated so closely that none but the expert, on close examination, reveals the minor points of imitation.

An Art Table Cover Free. We wish to introduce Oxien Nazone Salve into thousands of new homes and to accomplish this intend to actually give away these rich and ornamental Table Covers to our friends. We shall send a handsome cover, about two feet and a half square, of the richest and most pleasing designs, and being in appearance like the hand-made covers that Armenian experts sell for from $12 to $25 each, to one agent in each city or town who will sell for us only two boxes Nazone Salve at 25c. apiece. We send the goods on credit and trust to your honor in returning the moment your 50c. arrives. Can you resist it?

A WORD ABOUT IT. The ware is an entirely new product called Embossed Opal, from its similarity in shade to the famous opal stone. It is a magnificent embossed semi-white ware, very firm, not brittle and made in just the attractive shapes pictured in our illustration. There are ten useful pieces in the complete set. A pair of Jugs 10 inches high and 19 inches in circumference fitted with stoppers for Toilet Waters or Bay Rum; one large Tray II inches long, § inches wide, for Comb, Brush and Mirror; another Tray for Tooth Brush, Curlers and knick-knacks; one round cornered Puff Box and an oblong Hair Pin Box. Every article very useful.

THE HAND PAINTING. The decorations on each piece are in matural flower interviolets, pansies, roses, etc., furnishing the subjects, and the colorings are equal to nature's own work. WRITTEN FOR COMPORT.

E are told by scientists that there are over ten thousand different kinds of water-birds, nd of this vast family there are some peculiar members that are not only dependent on the water for a livelihood, but that are as much at home in and under the water as they are in the air.

The first odd thing that strikes us about some of these aquatic birds is that they are not all web-footed, as not all web-footed, as just the contrary is the case. One species that is fondest of the water is a little songster belonging to the thrush family, and called the dipper or water-ousel. This species is widely-distributed, but is usually found in the vicinity of swiftly-flowing mountain streams. Here it darts in and out of rapids, pools and waterfalls with perfect fearlessness and great apparent enjoyment, in search of food. An instance is recorded of a pair of dippers that built their nest under a waterfall, in the vacant space behind where the waterfall leaped from the rock above, and in this strange place successfully above, and in this strange place successfully raised their brood of young.

While in the water the ousel uses its wings in the same manner as when flying, and thus makes very rapid progress. Their wings being short and broad are well adapted for this use, the tail is very short and the whole body is covered thick with soft down, which thoroughly protects the bird from the water.

On the approach of an enemy the ousel always dives and runs along the stream for yards before coming up to breathe. Even the young birds will do this with the greatest confidence. Sometimes a bird that is not strictly an aquatic bird becomes one in a case of emergency. An instance is related of a king-fisher that was attacked by a king-bird. He started to fly, but was no match for his persistent little tormenter while in the air, so he dove under water, only coming up to float on the surface and then dive again, and in this way escaped.

Another curious bird is the Chinese yacana or water-pheasant, which is almost as much at home under the surface of the water as on the shore. The yacana has long legs and very long toes, which enable it to walk on the pads of lily or lotus that grow near the shore where it finds its food. When searching for food or on the approach of danger the yacana slips under water and walks along the bottom of the stream. When it wishes to conceal itself it makes its way to where the pads are thickest, and thrusting its bill above the surface is enabled to remain in this position indefinitely.

The water-hen, a cousin of the yacana is another bird that is quite at home under water, but does not seem bright enough to adopt the yacana's method of breathing when hiding, and is therefore sometimes drowned. Cases have been known where a water-hen, on being wounded by a hunter, has dived to the bottom of a stream and seizing a tough weed in its bill has held on until death came to prevent being captured.

Another bird with similar habits is the grebe. It is an excellent swimmer and diver and has captured.

Another bird with similar habits is the grebe. It is an excellent swimmer and diver and has the same habit the jacana has, of hiding under water, with its bill thrust up above the surface, until danger is over.

The water-hen makes up for its stupidity while under water for the skill it displays in nest building. The nest is placed near the water's edge, but so nicely is the distance calculated that it is seldom flooded by high tides or freshets. A story is told of a pair of water-hens that had a nest with the eggs in it nearly hatched, when an unexpected rise of the water threatened to flood their home. They at once set to work, and by building up underneath, succeeded in raising the nest out of harm's way.

A well-known Cincinnati physician has discovered a remedy that cures Goitre or Thick Neck. And to prove this he sends a free trial package so that patients may try and know positively that gives it the appearance of a large snake in the water. We are told that when collecting food for its young the bird swallows the fish it captures, and then the young bird runs its bill down the old one's neck and swallows the fish for its own dinner.

The guillemont, which is sometimes, though incorrectly called a loon, is another aquatic bird that has some interesting habits. The guillemont lays only one egg on the bare cliffs of the nesting-ground. When the young are ready to launch out, the guillemont takes the chick on its back, and flying beyond the breakers to the smooth water, drops the youngster

Instances of curious water-birds could be multiplied indefinitely, and in fact the whole subject of the habits of our friends of fur, fins, and feathers, as animals, birds and fishes have been called is one of the rarest interest to all Nature lovers.

V'ood-Engraving.

WRITTEN FOR COMPORT.

HE art of wood-engraving is very old, older by some two hundred years than the art of printing. The first use of engravings of any sort of which we have any record are the stamps which the ancient Egyptians used to impress upon bricks. These stamps were made of stone with the inscription cut upon them in high relief, and they were used by the ancient builders in stamping the bricks in the proing the bricks in the pro-cess of making which were used in ancient buildings. Some of these bricks have come down to us at the present day; and there are some specimens of them in the British Museum. Later it became customary to use a sort of engraved stamp for signing docu-ments. Pope Adrian and Charlemagne were among the first known possessors of stamps of this sort.

These early engravings of course were not woodengravings, but they probably furnished the idea for wood-engravings. The Chinese have for many centuries printed books from blocks engraved on wood, and still use this method at the present day. The first wood-engravings we know anything about among European nations were used by the German playing-card makers, who used to manufacture their wares by this method. Later whole books were made from engraved blocks and are now known as block-books. Religious prints were also issued in considerable numbers, most of them very wide specimens indeed.

With the invention of morable types blocks.

In considerable numbers, most of them very wide specimens indeed.

With the invention of movable types blockbooks became a thing of the past, and for a time the art of engraving fell into disuse, but soon the demand for illustrations caused a revival of the art, which began to enjoy a popularity greater than ever before. The engravings of this period were extremely crude, with little or no artistic merit.

In the 16th century an engraver by the name of Durer began to produce work that was far better than anything of the kind that had preceded him. After Durer however the art fell into disuse again until it was revived by an English engraver, Bewick by name, whose work, compared with that of his predecessors was truly wonderful. Even today the lover of wood-engravings finds a great deal to admire in Bewick's work. Bewick lived to a ripe old age and during his life time produced thousands of fine illustrations. From Bewick's time until within a few years wood-engraving flourished, as it was the only way known for

Wood engravers became very skillful, as the demand for their services increased, and some demand for their services increased, and some of the publications of fifteen or twenty years ago contain some beautiful specimens of their work. In order to complete large illustrations quickly it was customary to divide the large block upon which the drawing was made into a number of small pieces which were given to different workmen, and the whole was after—

VERY visitor to New York is familiar with the sight of the groups of emi-grants that fre-quent the vicini-ty of the railway ty of the railway stations and the steamboat docks. Queerly dressed, helpless folk in ones, twos and groups of whole families ignorant of the language and manners of the great coun-try that they have chosen for their new home, huddled together like herds of cattle, and gazing in open eyed wonder at the strange sights and scenes, or waiting with stolid indifference and brute-like patience for the next stage in their journey, they seem the very personification of helpless-g Americans. er like herds of tion of helplessness and ignorance to hustling Americans.

Yet before being admitted to this country, these people have been obliged to undergo a rather strict examination before a board of inquiry and must be adjudged by this board to be in good condition mentally, physically and financially before they are allowed to enter our portals. Uncle Sam has found it very necessary to protect this country from those who would probably turn out to be only public charges. Hundreds of these imigrants are sent back each year to the ports at which they embarked.

barked.

Figures of the Immigration Department show that in the year ending June 1899, nearly 219,000 emigrants landed in America, and of this large number nearly 179,000 landed at New York. This means considerable work for the York. This means considerable work for the Board of Inquiry there, and it is needless to say that the examinations conducted are rapid and to the point. Over five-hundred applicants a day are considered, and the members of the Board are obliged to keep sharply on the look-out for emigrants who are not able to comply with the requirements for admission to this country.

with the requirements for admission to this country.

Those who are rejected are at once shipped back to the port of embarkation where they are left by the steamboat company to find their way home as best they can. Many a poor foreigner has been induced by some oilytongued steamship agent to turn his worldly goods into money and set sail for America, the golden land of promise, only to find upon arrival that he is lacking in some of the requirements for entrance, and accordingly is obliged to return, worse off than he was before.

One of the requirements of the law is that each emigrant must have at least $30 in his possession, or convince the board that there is no immediate danger of his becoming a public charge. Most of the foreigners are able to do this, but some are not, and are accordingly sent back on the next steamer.

The number of emigrants that come to the United States each year to join relatives who have previously made their homes here, shows that thousands find life here pleasanter than in Europe, and have succeeded in reaching a state of comparative prosperity. Others have stayed here a time, and then return to bring their families back with them. Figures show that most of our arrivals stay and eventually become citizens of the United States, the larger number of this class coming from England, Scotland, or Ireland. On the other hand some stay only long enough to accumulate a small sum of money, and then returned to their native land to live in ease for the rest of their days. This was especially true in the case of the Chinese, who are now, however, denied admission to this country.

Recently the buildings on Ellis Island, where the emigrants stayed while awaiting examination, were burned, so temporary quarters were arranged for them on board the sound steamer Narragansett. Here there is a kitchen, and comfortable and clean sleeping quarters for men and women. The Barge Office where the Board of Inquiry sits now contains an office for exchanging money, and also a place where railroad tickets may be purchased. This is a great advantage to the poor foreigners, who frequently fell into the hands of sharpers and swindlers who fleeced them of their money on their arrival.

Castle Garden, formerly the building occupied by the immigration officers, and now known as the Aquarium, was also celebrated in the earlier days of New York as a favorite summer amusement place. Here Jenny Lind made her debut under the management of the immortal P. T. Barnum, and by her sweet voice charmed all who listened, and proved her right to the title of the "Swedish Nightingale."

Of the vast number of foreigners arriving daily in New York, few stay in the city, but hurry on to different points in the United States, chiefly to the west, where they engage in farming. Italians lead in point of numbers, though a rather small percentage stay and become citizens. Great Britain next, while Germany, France, Sweden, and in fact representatives from nearly all the European countries swell the total. Turkey had the distinction last year of sending the fewest immigrants here.

Inkless Printing.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HESE are the days of painless surgery horseless carriages smokeless powder, and wireless telegraphy, and it now seems like-and it now seems likely that one more will be added to this list of paradoxes, and inkless printing become an established fact.

This art of printing is accomplished by a current of electricity which passes through paper and type at the moment of contact.

The process is as yet in its infancy, though it is understood that it is being rapidly perfected, and it is quite likely that it may become sufficiently so to prove of great commercial importance. Inkless printing may become one of the

and it is quite likely that it may become surficiently so to prove of great commercial importance. Inkless printing may become one of the great innovations of the 20th century, though at present it is not evident that the new process is causing the magnates of the ink trust any sleepless nights.

In 1897 the first patent was taken out for a process of inkless printing. It was necessary by the method then patented to use wet paper. After coming from the press the paper apparently was unchanged, and it was only after a bath in a developing solution that the printing made its appearance. This was found to be unsatisfactory for two reasons: first because it was hard to manage wet paper, and second, because the time required for developing each sheet more than offset any advantages the new method possessed. The needs of modern printers demand that the work be done on dry paper and that it issue complete from the press, without any subsequent handling being necessary.

These conditions, it is now claimed, have been fulfilled. A new chemical has been discovered

These conditions, it is now claimed, have been fulfilled. A new chemical has been discovered which is abundant and cheap. It is mixed with the paper pulp in the process of manufacture. As the paper passes through the cylinder press at the instant it meets the type a current of electricity passes through, and at every point of contact the image immediately appears, a beautiful bright black. No further handling is necessary. It is stated that some fine effects have been produced, especially on illustrated work. In many respects the new process is the same as printing with ink. It is just as necessary to secure a good, even impression of the type to produce good results, and by overlaying parts of the form the same beautiful variations of color may be produced as in regular work.

An ordinary press is used in the new process with the exception that all parts that have to do with the distribution of the ink are removed. This is an advantage in that these parts of the press and their removal makes it easier to run and less liable to get of order. The cylinder of These conditions, it is now claimed, have been Reading is a delight that can be recalled at will, and when the choice of books is good there can be no sting to poison the memory of such a healthy enjoyment.

Gentlemen:—Fours of a recent date received and also the curtains by express. I will let you know that I am very greatly pleased with the curtains and will send you in another club order in a week or two for another pair, which I want to give to my aunt for a "Christmas" present.

Very truly yours,

The last month of the old year, my dears, is here, and what a very little while it does seem since I greeted you all at the first of the year and the opening of the twentieth century. It is a sad thought this ending of the year, but it is gladdened by Christmas and the holiday season, the merriest time of the year, and let us all be bright and cheery as the old one goes, and meet the new one with a smile and start off with it hand in hand.

Now to our talk, and the first one comes from Tebo, Mich., from Cousin Birdie who wants to know if she should return a ring to a young man who asks her for it, though he gave it to her as a birthday gift. Give it back to him, of course. I wouldn't want to be seen with anything belonging to that kind of an individual.—As to going driving with hired help, it would depend on who the help is. If he is a nice man, all right; if not, don't go, even if there is nobody else to go with.—I should say that eighteen was too young to have "steady company".

Sixteen-year-old girls should not have any heart troubles; they will have enough of that by and by. WO gentlemen in evening dress and carrying light overcoats left the door of overcoats left the door of a handsome brown-stone house on Fifth Avenue, New York, one summer evening at nearly six o'-

Chatting pleasantly they went their way down the busy thoroughfare, nodding to this one and that, as men whose long residence in the place gave them acquaintance. gave them acquaintance with many people. They were then on their way to dine with one of "earth's favored ones," at whose palatial mansion they were to meet the fairest debutante of the past sea-

The evening being so

The evening being so warm and they somewhat early for their appointment, they had agreed to walk and while crossing a street their attention was attracted by the sound of music. Street musicians are not so uncommon as to ordinarily attract attention, but there was something in this which these gentlemen, both musicians of no mean ability, although amateurs, recognized as out of the ordinary; and as if by one impulse they stopped, looked at each other and then down the side street from whence the sound came.

looked at each other and then down the side street from whence the sound came.

"That's not bad," said Colfax, the elder of the two. "In fact, it's very good," he added as a gentle breeze sent the sound of violins towards them with increased volume.

"Let's go down and see about it," suggested the younger man. "We've time enough."

The two turned west and in the middle of the square they came upon a little crowd gathered round two men, who with violins under their chins, were playing in the street. These men were dark, foreign-looking chaps, roughly dressed, but one forgot their appearance while listening to their really wonderful playing. It was not the catchy dance music which one aswas not the catchy dance music which one associates with street musicians in common, but the works of famous composers found rare in-terpretation, and Colfax and his friend ex-changed glances of keen appreciation as one familiar number after another was played with unfailing accuracy and precision. After two or three selections had been played, one of the men took off his cap and passed it to the peo-

Mr. Colfax's familiarity with Italian made it easy for him to engage the men in talk and he quickly learned their story. They had arrived in New York a week before from Italy in company with a man who had promised them work and big wages, but who had disappeared and they had been obliged to play in the streets to earn their bread.

Mr. Colfax thought a moment and then said, "Come to this number at ten o'clock this even-

The men thankfully promised to be at his rooms at the hour appointed and Colfax and his friend, hailing a passing cab were whirled on to their destination.

A few moments past ten they reached Colfax's rooms. "I wonder if they will be here," he remarked. "Probably not."

As he spoke two dark figures rose from the steps.

As he spoke two dark figures rose from the steps.

"Ah, here you are. That's good. Come in. Now for some music."

The men played as if inspired. Duets for two violins and each in turn at the piano, they played for an hour. At the end of that time Colfax was wild with delight.

"No more street playing for you?" he said.

"No more street playing for you," he said.
"Tomorrow I'll get you places in the best orchestra in the city." As the men started to go Colfax handed to one a bill, saying, "For present needs, my friend. You'll soon be able to earn more."

The man bowed and murmured some words of thanks, then as he passed out he rolled the bill into a taper and with it lighted the cigar which Colfax had given him.

"Well," said Colfax to his friend, "that's cool. Maybe he hasn't been long enough in this country to know that that kind of paper means something. He'll have to be looked after a little."

The two gentlemen sat smoking and talking together till it was nearly twelve o'clock when there was a knock at the door. Colfax opened it and nearly fell over backwards in his aston-

CONDITIONS.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living paimists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:
Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to Comfort Palmistry Club, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank

tor readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coaled with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheel of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carfully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putly is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well laken to bring out all the ines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixait.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

HE present article will have to be given

HE present article will have to be given up for the most part to readings, but I trust it will be found helpful to the average club member as well.

K. J. L., has a hand denoting a great deal of character with courage, perseverance and energy. The life line is not very long, ending in the impression I have before me, at about fifty to fifty-five. There will be a decided change in this life between the ages of forty and forty-five and I think a second marriage will take place then. The first marriage, or if not a marriage a very close friendship or love affair appears between the ages of eighteen and thirty. The fate line is very good in this hand, indicating excellent success up to the age of fifty, although I do not see many signs of wealth. There is an excellent head line also, showing good sense and business ability with plenty of self confidence and an evenly balanced mind. The heart line indicates that this subject will be eminently sensible in love affairs, choosing a mate for life from a practical standpoint rather than a sentimental. A good deal of traveling about is indicated, with popularity and many close friendships. I see few signs of trouble, and although the life will be successful, the subject will always work hard.

Hilldrop has a hand that is much more lined ways work hard. Hilldrop has a hand that is much more lined much more lined than the last one and with very marked characteristics. This person is very ambitious and will marry well. There will be a good deal of trouble in love affairs during the first twenty-five first twenty-five years of her life and she will have one disappoi ntment which will cause her a good deal of anxiety.

But s he will marry well and her second marri-

her second marriage I think will be happier than her first. She is very attractive to the opposite sex and will have many suitors and several serious love affairs. In some of these she will be strongly opposed by relatives of either party, but will finally marry according to her ambition and will be quite successful for a while. In middle life she will make a second marriage, which as I have said, will be more successful than the first and will be attended by more wealth. She will travel considerable, although not in this country. She is inclined to be not in this country. She is inclined to be sentimental and sometimes to prevarications. She is also inclined to be melancholy at times, and should strive against this latter feeling. She was much hampered in her youth and had an unhappy childhood; by far the happier and more successful portion of her life will come after she is thirty and she will live to a good old age.

B. O. S. sends an excellent impression, made secure with fixatif so that it is easy to read.

The two pre-ceding ones were very badly blurred. B. O. S. has a hand which shows a good deal of trial and trouble but one in which the fate line rises supreme and by turning diag-onally across to onally across to the mount of the Sun brings fame affected the subject in an unexpected way. I think there was a marriage or a serious love affair at that time but it disappears in the course of a few years, after which the life flows on more placidly and the fate line grows stronger. I think this subject has a great fature before her and has talent for the stage. If she were to study for the stage she would be attended with success in proportion to the amount of perseverance which she develops, a quality in which she is somewhat lacking. I think there was some mystery connected with her birth or possibly some scandal or disgrace for which she is not responsible. She will rise superior to it however, and is sure to make her mark in the world either as an actress, a lecturer, a writer or a teacher. She is somewhat sentimentally inclined and if anything a little lacking in regard for truth. She needs to cultivate this quality, to have more courage and to develop patience. It would be better for this person not to marry, although she will have plenty of opportunities. She will have to make her way through difficulties but will succeed and have both fame and money in her old age. I see much traveling for her and a nervous disposition with some rather startling and unusual changes during middle life.

A member of the Club asks for prices of good books on palmistry. Most of the larger books, such as Cheiro's Language of the Hand and Professor Hargett's are two dollars. Heron Allen's is $1.50 and there are others at from $1 upwards. If any of you desire these books, it would be well to write to Breateney's Union So New well to write to Brentano's, Union Sq., New York.

As there are stars on several of the hands

"A star, wherever it appears, is generally the indication of some event we cannot possibly control; it is generally a danger and always something unavoid-able. Whether, however, it is good or bad, depends of course upon the aspect of the lines, particu-larly of the line of fortune. This, however, is fixed —that a star, where yer it is found, always means something and what that something is, be it the task of the chirosophist to discover.

On the Mount of Jupiter, it signifies gratified ambition, good luck, honour, love and success. With a cross on this Mount it indicates a happy marriage with some one of brilliant antecedents or high position.

On the Mount of Saturn it indicates a great fatality, generally a very bad one, indicating with corroborative signs, probably murder, and in a criminal or otherwise bad hand a probability of doth when the senfold in a criminal or otherwise bad hand a probability of death upon the scaffold.

On the Mount of Apollo, with no line of Apollo in the hand, it betokens wealth without happiness, and celebrity after a hazardous struggle for it. With the line of brilliancy it denotes excessive celebrity, as the combined result of labor and talent; with several lines also on the mount it is a sure indication of wealth. wealth.

wealth.

On the Mount of Mercury it betrays dishonesty and theft. On the Mount of Mars, violence leading to homicide.

On the Mount of the Moon it indicates hypocrisy and dissimulation, with misfortune resulting from excess of the imagination. The old chiromants looked upon this as a warning of death by drowning, and stated that combined with a high mount invaded by the line of the head, it indicated suicide by drowning.

On the base of the Mount of Venus it indicated a misfortune brought about by the influence of women.

cated a misfortune brought about by the influence of women.

On the first (or outer) phalanx of any finger (but especially that of Saturn) a star indicates either strange good luck or else folly. On the third (or lowest) phalanx of the finger, or Saturn, a star warns the subject of a danger of assassination, and if at this point it is joined by the line of Saturn, a disgraceful death is almost inevitable, resulting as a rule from the vices shown elsewhere in the hand.

On the base of the phalanx of logic of the thumb—in fact, on the junction of the phalanx of logic and the Mount of Venus—it points to a misfortune connected with a woman, probably indicating an unhappy marriage, which will be the curse of the subject's whole life unless the Mount of Jupiter be developed, in which case there is a probability that the subject will get over it.

which case there is a probability that the subject will get over it.

A star on the voyage line indicates with certainty death by drowning.

If a star be found on the center of the quadrangle, the subject, though true and honest as the day, will be the absolute plaything of women, a trait which will result in misfortune, from which, however, he will recover in time."

'Thus it will be seen that a star is almost the most important sign to seek for in a hand.

W. S. Harter, an honored and Influential citizen of Nevada, Mo., makes a statement and an overgenerous offer that comes in the shape of a proclamation of health to all afflicted with loss of vitality and its kindred allments. His case was a most pitiable one, nightly emissions so draining and his constitution was weakened to such a degree that it was impossible for him to perform his duties. He spent hundreds of dollars for remedies and to specialists, but could not regain his vitality or check the awful nightly emissions. One day a brother lodge member called his attention to a remedy, in fact, implored Mr. Harter to take the remedy for his affliction; he did so, and in one month's time was entirely cured, his constitution rejuvenated and his vitality regained. Today he is a man in every sense which that word would imply. Mr. Harter is not what one would call an immensely rich man, but his gratitude for this marvelous remedy is so great that he says he intends making his life's labor that of putting his remedy in the hands of all those afflicted as he was. WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ANDREW Carnegie the Iron and Steel King of Pittsburgh, while he has been a man of large and general benvolen ce will be rememwill be remem-bered chiefly through the series —it might almost —It might almost be called a system —of public libra-ries which he has founded. "The value of the pub-lic library as an educational force in American life" says Mr. William M. Stevenson, Librarian of the Free Library of Allegheny, Pa., "is inestimable. It is the most democratic of all forms of popular recreation. The public library comes closer to the people in this country than any other institution, the aim of which is the uplifting and upbuilding of the masses."

No man has done more to the people in the country than any other institution, the same of which is the uplifting and upbuilding of the masses."

No man has done more to foster this form of popular education than has Andrew Carnegie. He has now aided and founded a score of public libraries and his benefactions in this direction exceed six millions of dollars. This is more than the annual appropriation for Common Schools made by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The libraries founded by Mr. Carnegie have placed in the hands of their readers more than ten million volumes of books. They have refunded for maintenance up to August 1899 a million and a quarter of dollars. The area of their influence extends from Edinburgh, Scotland, in the east, to Fairfield, Iowa, in the west, and from Inverness, Scotland, in the north to Atlanta, Georgia, in the south.

Mr. Carnegie's motto, notwithstanding he is one of our great modern philanthropists is that "God helps those who help themselves." The principles therefore on which his libraries are founded is that the community must support them, wholly, where possible. If not, at least partially, although in one or two instances, notably his beloved city of Allegheny, the gift is absolutely without restriction.

In the short space of ten years, Mr. Carnegie has given twelve library buildings fully equipped with books to as many different communities.

There are thus two classes in Mr. Carnegie's benefaction, the Free Library and the Free Public Library. The former is an absolute gift maintained wholly or in part by the donor, the latter is a free library supported by public taxation. The great institutionat Allegheny, Pa., is a Free Library of which the entire cost of building and books and for current maintenance and support is contributed by Mr. Carnegie. The Library at Edinburgh, Scotland, is, on the other hand, the largest and most notable in the list of Free Public Libraries that comes under the general head of this remarkable benefaction. Mr. Carnegie is a Scotchman, having been born in the "land' ocakes" in 1837. He came to this country along with the family when only ten years old. Although a mere boy, he was stron

Mr. Carnegie, unlike many other builders and owners of great fortunes is a conspicuous benefactor in other ways. Although he has never held public office he is a public spirited citizen of the highest and broadest type. A man from whom an important public utterance may be expected when any great issue is pending. Perhaps nothing is more explanatory of the man and his success than that he had all his life been a close student of men and affairs; of life, of literature, even of the arts.

A recent writer pays him this tribute: "With but rudimentary education he has become a facile writer, a ready speaker, well informed on social, political and philosophical questions, the practical matters so closely related to human happiness and progress."

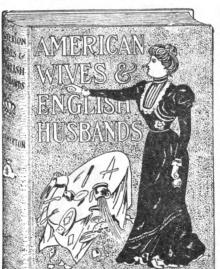

Probably no man has wasted fewer hours in a long and useful life than Andrew Carnegie. Even his outings have been made famous and profitable to the public. His "American Four-In-Hand In Britain," the record of a coaching trip through the British Isles, has had a large public sale, and by sheer force of literary charm it became, when published, a generally popular book. When he speaks on public questions with his pen, he commands an audience that is only bounded by the confines of civilization. His "Triumphant Democracy" has sold fifty thousand copies, and he is a contributor of much force and moment to the leading English and American reviews.

Mr. Carnegie's public benefactions including the Carnegie Institute at Pittsburg and his series of libraries are upwards of ten millions of dollars and are being constantly added to. He is an eminent example of that noble spec-of dollars and are being constantly added to.

He is an eminent example of that noble spectacle which is represented in America by several people invites them.

Recently several processes combining photography with etching have come into vogue, and furnished a cheap and effective way of producing illustrations. Some beautiful effects have been obtained by means of these illustra-tions, and they are certainly invaluable in a great many ways. Cheap reproductions of painting and scenes from nature have been possible, and hardly a magazine or book is issued now-a-days that is not filled with these illustrations.

At the same time the lovers of the beautiful and artistic in fine book-making have never been quite satisfied with the new order of been quite satisfied with the new order of things, and though of recent years wood-engraving has become much less common, it has never lost its admirers. For years the leading publishers have employed wood-engravers to re-touch copper process cuts, and give them the artistic feeling and individuality that the originals lacked. At the present day the wood-engraver's art seems to be on the increase, rather than sinking into oblivion.

As a pastime, wood-engraving will be found very fascinating for those who care to try it. Boxwood or maple is the material used; boxwood is better for fine work though maple will

It is cut across the grain so that the engraver works on the end of the wood fibres. It may be bought all ready prepared in any of our large cities and costs from one cent an inch for maple up to ten or fifteen cents an inch for the best imported boxwood. For implements the beginner will require four or five gravers of different shapes, a small oil-stone for sharpening the tools, a leather pad upon which to rest the work, and a magnifying glass of moderate power supported on a standard, and adjustable as to height. The whole outfit need not cost more than four or five dollars.

The first step is to prepare the block for use, and this is done by painting it over with a thin coat of Chinese white. The drawing may now be drawn or traced directly on the wood. It is best for a first attempt to start with some drawing that contains only a few coarse lines.
After the drawing is traced it may be gone over carefully with India ink. In tracing the drawing care should be taken to have it the reverse of the way it is to appear in the finished print, so that letters and figures will appear as they are in the original.

After the drawing is complete the block is After the drawing is complete the block is placed on the pad and held with one hand, while the other hand works with the graver, cutting away all the wood from the black lines, and leaving the drawing in relief. Great care must be taken not to let the tool slip, as every scratch that marks the black lines of the drawing will show in the finished print. It is necessary first to outline the work with very fine lines of the graver, and then to clear away the waste wood taking care not to let the tool bear on the edge of any finished line, as the marks

There are a number of different kinds of gravers, but the beginner will need only three or four; a graver for cutting very fine lines and for outlining the work, one a little coarser for cutting thicker lines and for cleaning away small spaces, and a gouge with a round point for cleaning away superfluous wood.

A good light is of course essential, and to avoid the galare and focus the respective work.

The production of really fine work calls for artistic as well as mechanical skill of no mean heavy black and white effects are by no means difficult to execute, and are very pleasing. To take a proof of one's work it will be necessary to obtain a roller such as printers use, or a pad covered with soft leather, and a small quantity of printer's ink. This is spread on a smooth surface, preferably wood or glass, and a thin layer rolled or dabbed evenly over the engraving. A sheet of paper is next placed over the Next rub over the whole of the surface with a burnisher—the handle of an old toothbrush will do very well, and the print of the engraving will be transferred to the paper. It will usually be necessary to go over the work again, correcting some of its irregularities and defects. Only a hint of the process of course can be given in a short article, but the beginner in engraving can find plenty of instruction on the subject in any public library, and as the work goes on and simple designs are executed, the interest will grow, and the ambition will be aroused to do more difficult pieces of work. In this connection it is interesting of work. In this connection it is interesting to note that Robert Louis Stevenson was an enthusiastic amateur wood-engraver, and some of the first blocks done by him are on exhibiquality; but simple designs in outline with tion in the Boston Public Library.

A $2000.00 Dog and An Artist's Proof for $1600.00. As a painter of child and dog life, the world knows no superior to George A. Holmes. In this, considered his best canvas, he has caught the true spirit of friendship which exists between children and dogs, a friendship which is proverbial, and in this subject he creates a true delineation of character, showing a thorough appreciation of the nature of his subjects. It was a real incident which furnished Mr. Holmes with the subject of "Can't You Talk?" He heard a little child ask a big dog that very question one day and determined to reproduce the scene. So "taking" was it that the picture was sold for a large sum at the private view of the Academy where it was first exhibited, and so great was the run on the reproductions that frame makers were kept constantly at work night and day to keep pace with the demand. Even the dog that was used for the model acquired value beyond its worth in the eves of the publisher, and he offered the owner $2000.00 for it, but the sum was refused. The picture is one of those with a legal history, for the court has, on more than one occasion, decided questions involving the infringement of the copyright of this valuable property. The early prints themselves have increased enormously in price, and not very long ago an artist's proof was sold for $1600.00.

BITTER MEDICINE. The Doctor Orders It. There is not one among us, from the youngest to the oldest but what dislike to take medicine in any form. This distaste is especially strong among the younger generation. In such cases it often becomes necessary for the Family Doctor to administer his dose by force Our picture shows the critical moment when the Doctor, with the baby in his arms, who is crying, kicking and protesting in every way possible, is endeavoring to make it take the contents of the big spoon which he holds in his left hand. Gathered around the chair of the Doctor is arranged the balance of the family, all eager and anxious to see the results of his efforts. The baby's sister has heard the cries of her little brother and come running to see what is the matter, and stands looking at the Doctor, enjoying his unsuccessful attempts to overcome the violent protests of the little baby brother. The mother is directly in the rear of the Doctor's chair, and leaning over his shoulder, watches his efforts and those of her baby with motherly interest; while the father, leaning on the table, takes things more seriously. The scene is one which every family who has been through this homely and familiar experience will recognize, for families are perpetuated by babies. Babies become sick and either the parent or the Doctor must of necessity give the medicine, and to accomplish this, as our picture shows, heroic measures are sometimes necessary. In this particular instance, Resistance and Patience seem to be pitted against each other, with the chances in favor of Patience. Mr. Fleischer, the painter, belongs to the Munich school.

24 inches and when suitably framed looks as nice hanging on the wall as any genuine, original, handpainted canvass costing $10.00, $20.00 or even $1000.00. In preparing the paper for these pictures, by a process taken from the Germans, a canvass-like appearance is given the surface and is quite as prominent as in pictures that are actually painted on canvass.

This feature alone dispels any thought of the viewer that the cost was any small sum because the color harmonizing is perfect in every minute detail giving about nineteen blends and hues in some of the subjects. By arrangements with the Publishers to take one-half million or more of this assortment of the four most popular pictures in the world we are enabled to make these most liberal offers.

DEFIANCE—OR STAG AT BAY. A Million Bollar Artist. This particular subject was one of Landseere; best pictures. The love of this great painter for all dumb creatures found expression in his art, and wide spread appreciation of his paintings show how firmly the love of animals is fixed in the human mind. No painting has ever been more popular and no one, with the possible exception of Rosa Bonheur, has approached him as a painter of animals. Sir Edwin Landseere, the son of John Landseere, the celebrated engraver, was born in London, March 7th, 1802, and died October 1st, 1873. His remains were interred among the Nation's honored dead in St. Paul's Cathedral. When he died his property amounted to over $800,000. His various canvasses selling for $30,000 to $50,000 each, he thus easily earned more than a million dollars from his work. The incident of the picture "Defiance" shows the end of a long hunt over the mountains. The hounds have followed the stag so closely, and in the hope of baffling his pursuers he has taken to the lake, but, nothing daunted, two of the pack follow, yelping, barking and biting at his haunches. When knee deep in water, the gallant stag stops and makes a stand; with a thrust of his noble antlers, born of desperation, he strikes and fells one of the dogs, severely injuring the other which immediately sets up a cry of mingled pain and terror, endeavoring by his yelps to secure the assistance of the rest of the pack, who are standing on the shore a faraid to follow. The shades of the long winter day are falling on the shores of the lonely mountain lake where the rivals have finished their fearful race of the afternoon. Night falls, and the moon makes her appearance, and there, bleeding from long gashes, breathless, but dauntless, the stag stands, bellowing forth defiance with all his waning energy. The moon sets and darkness throws a veil over the scene, not to be lifted until morning breaks showing the stag still at bay.

The indications of the scheme are not as promising for the welfare of the nation as usual, threatening more than usual mortality from cold and wasting diseases, involving the stomach, liver, kidneys and lungs. The lunation falls almost exactly upon the planet Saturn and the people generally are urged not to be neglectful of colds, but to protect the body as faithfully as possible. At best there must be an unusual prevalence of stomach and digestive troubles, many of them induced, no doubt, by carelessness of diet. Indulgencies in alcoholic beverages in past months will have inflicted serious injury to health upon a great many whose condition at this time will testify to their follies in the past. Nor is this alone confined to those who have so foolishly indulged, but indulgencies of the appetite for equally unhealthful and stimulating foods will be responsible for much dyspepsia and many rheumatic and neuralgiac aches and pains.

The presence of Saturn with the conjoined luminaries in the 7th house indicates some lack of harmony between the people and the executive authority of the government or some growing unpopularity of the ruler; also some treachery by which harm is done by public foes or rebellious persons in western and southwestern regions or upon the Mexican frontier. This antagonism of Saturn to the significator of the people prompts unusual activity of the benevolent and charitably classes by reason of extreme cold or inclemency of the season.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JANUARY, 1902.

JANUARY I-Wednesday. Do not use this day for engaging in affairs of importance, for misfortune will surely attend them if so begun. Social indulgencies will prove very mischievous if temperance and moderation are not observed; use the pen very cautiously, if at all, on this day; give no cause for offence to thine employer nor should favors be expected from such sources; brain and nervous diseases are aggravated at this time and it will be wise to be very prudent in diet; be on guard against fraud and deceit during the first ten days of this month; do not bargain for houses or lands nor change thy residence on this day.

2-Thursday. Money transactions are best left

2—Thursday. Money transactions are best left alone during the forenoon of this day, nor should any purchases be made for purposes of profit; have no dealings with judges, counsellors, or ecclesiastics; give preference to the afternoon for the elegant pursuits and all polite avocations; deal with the musician, artist, jeweler, and furnisher and seek pleasure from the drama and social and musical entertainments in the evening.

and social and musical entertainments in the evening.

3-Friday. Defer matters of much importance during the morning hours, but as the day advances let every energy be given to the prosecution of all regularly established business: specially urge all transactions in connection with the literary world: make contracts pertaining to printing and publishing and press all commercial engagements; adjust accounts, hasten correspondence, do press-writing and employ the mind to its fullest extent for the next 36 hours; make applications to superiors for favors or advantages and expect agreeable experiences from real estate and mining matters, unless thy nativity be very evil generally in this respect.

4-Saturday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday in unless thy nativity be very evil generally in this respect.

4-Saturday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday in the particulars indicated, wasting no time in pleasure seeking; the merchant and traveller are peculiarly favored on this day; when also accounts should be attended to and all mathematical and scientific work should be pushed to the utmost; bargain and sell real estate; purchase printing material in established business of this nature; sell mining stocks and all certificates pertaining to land or its products; make contracts relative to mortgages or the development or improvement of buildings or lands and adjust all controversies concerning same.

5-Sunday. The foreneous is the best contracts.

5-Sunday. The forenoon is the best part of this day for religious exercises, although the musical portion of service is less promotive of good than usual and the elegant and artistic in life give less than usual satisfaction.

6—Monday. This day has but little to recommend it, and should not be chosen for the execution of deeds or writings, nor should the judgment be too implicitly relied upon during the day. This is particularly true of persons born about the 9th of January, April, July, or October, of past years, for such persons are likely to be now immersed in troublesome circumstances, business setbacks or physical ailments, according to the time of day at which born; mental anxieties or embarrassments, day at which born; mental anxieties or embarrassments, troubles through accounts or in correspondences, or anayances from slanderous or malicious tongues are frequently indicated for such nativities under like conditions. Let all persons so born studiously avoid all contracts concerning houses, lands, mines, or oil wells, and many of those here indicated are likely to be now brought to a realization of losses from past dealings in such matters; they certainly should not now make any beginnings of such nature but should act conservatively in every venture in their passing life; should run no risks with surplus capital nor be deluded by false promises of new ventures now presenting themselves.

7—Tuesday. Make no application to persons high

7.—Tuesday. Make no application to persons high in official position for any favor or advantage; control the temper and be slow and judicious in all the business moves of the day; keep out of disputes and have no dealings with mechanics or manufacturers; the afternoon and evening are the better parts of the day.

8 Wednesday. Avoid thy landlord at this time and beware of any extensive dealings in lands, mines il wells or any of the products of the earth. and beware of any extensive dealings in lands, mines, oil wells or any of the products of the earth.

9—Thursday. This is to be counted an extremely evil day; and RegCLUS cautions his friends against entering at this time upon any new business or enterprise, for nothing now begun will prosper nor should any permanent benefit or advantage be expected from the general transactions of the day; travel not, if it can be avoided, and beware of incurring the displeasure of those in authority. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday, or if born about the 9th of April, 11th of July, or 12th of October, of past years, do thou exercise extraordinary care in all thine acts for several weeks to come and particular caution is prompted as to diet and such habits as upset the digestive apparatus. The tendency in many such nativities is to lower the moral standard and incline the person to "dip" into a lower moral plane than that on which he was born. This results in many cases from discouraging circumstances which for a season seem to surround them and hinder their usual good fortune. Let all marriageable ladies, so born, beware of entering upon any matrimonial engagement at this time if their desire is for peace or good fortune in the marriage relation. Many of those so born who are already married are likely to be now considerably troubled in mind over the tide of misfortune that now seems to be falling to their lot through husband, father, or brother; patience and con-sideration are counselled for a season until the storn clouds break away and disclose the bright sunshine be-yond.

10—Friday. Close upon the heels of the evil conditions of yesterday come the benevolent influences of this day, promising to shorten the reign of mischief referred to and relieve in great measure the troubles and anxieties resulting from the inharmonious elements in such lives, Push business to the utmost during the first half of this day; buy goods for trade; consult lawyers; deal with bankers, judges, and persons of wealth and prominence; make money collections, urge correspondence, sign writings pertaining to commercial affairs; deal with printers, publishers, authors, ceientists and mathematicans, and give attention to all educational enterprises and the intellectual pursuits generally.

11—Saturday. Look out for disputes in the early and the interlectual pursuits generally.

11—Saturday. Look out for disputes in the early hours and avoid any unusual excitement if the heart be constitutionally affected, or serious complications arise at this time. Some bad fires are likely during the early morning hours; the mid hours of the day are the best.

12-Sunday. The forenoon conduces to happy efforts of the clergy, giving special eloquence and zeal to the temporaneous speaker and closer attention and more ready comprehension from the listener.

category, giving special enoquence and zeal to the extemporaneous speaker and closer attention and more ready comprehension from the listener.

13—Monday. Avoid speculations in houses and lands and give a wide berth to thy landlord and those engaged in the dirty and laborious occupations in life.

14—Tuesday. Be not rash in the early forencon, when also employees of great corporations and public officials are likely to give thee little consideration; but as the forencon advances let every energy be given to the prosecution of all business; make engagements concerning lands, buildings, excavations, wells, and stocks, mortgages, deeds, leases etc., pertaining to such things; deal in lumber, coal, wood, lead, petroleum, lime and all agricultural products; attend to the financial part of such dealings, purchase goods for trade, seek money accommodations, adjust accounts and make collections.

15—Wednesday. Waste none of the moments of this day, but pursue thine avocations vigorously, for thine exertions for pecuniary advantage in all honorable undertakings will meet with more than ordinary success; buy goods for profit; open new stores for business purposes, and make beginnings in the major enterprises; urge all literary pursuits, sign deeds and writings and file suits at law; give preference to the afternoon for transaction of business with dealers in hardware, cutlery, firearms, metals, glassware, brass and iron work, and chemical and electrical apparatus and also with all persons engaged in manufacture and in the ingenious and mechanical trades; mathematical and scientific work of magnitude should be commenced on this day.

16—Thursday. Use the forencon for thine engagements with public officials or with persons concerned mechanical traces; mathematical and scientific work of magnitude should be commenced on this day.

16.—Thursday. Use the forenoon for thine engagements with public officials or with persons concerned with trade marks, patents, or copyrights, but do not expect much progress in thine affairs in the afternoon when more baffling conditions prevail, more likely to bring disappointments if not actual losses; hold on to the purse-strings and see that thy pennies are not given for needless and unsatisfactory articles.

17.—Friday. The forenoon is indifferent but the afternoon and evening encourage prosecution of musical and artistic studies and good progress in all the elegant trades and avocations and give enjoyment from the drama, the fine arts, amusements and social gatherings; the evening is less favorable for the strictly intellectual engagements, discouraging mental efforts and giving unsatisfactory conclusions from such engagements of the past; the night hours increase activity among thieves and will witness some bad experiences from fires, explosions, or other classes of violent accidents.

18—Saturday. The early morning gives no promise of advantage from any enterprise but as the sun passes the moon mark thou mayst expect profit and benefit from all honorable pursuits; urge business to the utmost; enter into contracts concerning landed properties of all kinds and the products of the earth, such as produce, timber, lumber, coal, petroleum and wood; attend to financial transactions during the afternoon when also urge every honorable pursuit more vigorously than usual and despite the fact that it is the last hours of the week.

19—Sunday. A superior Sabbath day, when religious exercises will be earnest and effective and all church matters are prospered. Favors at the hands of superiors will be more readily obtained than usual and physical conditions will be buoyant and healthful; social matters will be discordant in the evening and lovers will need to be guarded against disagreements.

De guarded against disagreements.

20—Monday. The first two-thirds of this day will be specially fortunate for surveyors, printers, engravers, carvers, chemists and surgeons; have dentistry performed and pursue mathematical and scientific studies; urge all the literary pursuits and deal with the intellectual classes generally; do not expect any degree of success, however, in thy dealings with public men or government officials or with thine employer or thy superior in authority. authority.

21—Tuesday. Scrutinize thy business enterprises born on this day and have eare that thou art not misled by extravagant representations or over flattering ap-pearances. Keep out of all kinds of disputes; seek pleasure from polite literature or from the dramatical or musical entertainment in the evening.

pleasure from polite literature or from the dramatical or musical entertainment in the evening.

22—Wednesday. Give preference to the forenoon for the most important transactions of this day, the afternoon being more likely to give disappointment in most of the ventures in life; have no dealings with persons in the building trades or who are concerned in commerce; do not make any bargain relative to mortgages or leases or any of the earth's products.

23—Thursday. Conditions are very threatening on this day and money transactions have but little, if any, chance of success; inducements may be held out for speculation, but REGULUS advises his friends to beware of temptation; litigation and heavy loss, if not bank-ruptcy, are likely to fall to the lot of a very great majority of those who embark their surplus capital on this day; combustion is quickened and some bad fires and losses therefrom are very probable in these passing hours, and increased mortality from apoplexy and heart disease, also from hemorrhages and violence is more than likely. Persons born about the 17th of January or April, or 21st of July or 20th of October, of past years, will need to exercise more than ordinary care in finances during 1902, and should also be very prudent in diet and look out for fires; those of the gentle sex so born, should counsel their near male relatives to be specially guarded as to both health and pecuniary transactions.

24—Friday. Choose not this day for engaging in matters of great importance; have extra care in handling fire; avoid travelling; defer transactions in law; sign no contracts and postpone correspondence; rashness and violence will characterize many of the events of the day.

25—Saturday. An active and energetic day, encour-aging travel and the pursuit of chemical and all uncom-mon studies.

26—Sunday. Not a satisfactory day for mental engagements nor for religious exercises of any kind, and church matters suffer adversely; do not seek the society of the fair sex nor of persons advanced in years.

Actively pursue thy several avocations during all this day giving preference, however, to the forenoon for dealings in real estate, boots and shoes, dyes, wooi, lead, coal and all classes of building ma-terials; use the afternoon for thy money transactions in connection with thy regular and established business; seek money accommodations and urge all honorable pursuits. the foreno

Make applications to government officials during the morning hours; have nothing to do with house-painters, stucco-workers or decorators, during the middle part of the day when transactions with architects, furniture dealers and upholsterers should not be had; after the noon hours let attention be given to chemical and electrical enterprises, and pursue intellectual and literary labors during the evening and night hours.

Swanson's "5-DROPS" not only effects a quick, permanent, positive cure of all the above named diseases, but, by cleansing the system of all impurities, prevents the dreaded after effects, which are frequently as disastrous as the disease itself. No remedy ever produced will cure Rheumatism as safely and surely as Swanson's "5-DROPS." REV. F. M. COOPER, Washington, Center, Mo.

"I suffered terribly for two years from Nervous Prostration. I tried other nerve tonics with very little relief, and, in fact, I began to despair of ever being any better. Fortunately for me, Mr. Allen M. Sage recommended your remedy so highly and told what it had done for him that I was induced to try it. To my great astonishment one bottle of '5-DROPS' and one box of Swanson's Pills did me more good than all other medicines I had ever taken. I believe it to be the most wonderful discovery for nervous and rheumatic diseases of the present age."

With a Magnifying Glass.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT:

HERE is a wonderful world open to us through the magnify-ing glass. Some one has called this region "the back stairs of Nature," because its work is carried on out of sight It is the out of sight. It is the world of insects and small water-creatures with their queer changes. Look at this tiny crystal tube!

this tiny crystal tube! It darts to and fro, transacts its business deftly, yet it has no legs or wings or hands. Here seem to be a few specks of dust on a leaf. Through the glass we see they are transparent eggs. Very soon you can perceive distinctly the outline of a body inside, with legs, a head with protuberant black eyes; and then a lively creature skips forth, ready to feed or to fight!

These water and air worlds, the first lifestations so to speak, have many and odd patterns. Among the birds, quadrupeds and men the pattern is finally decided upon. You know at least how many legs, arms and eyes to expect and also where to expect them. But Nature has some surprising patterns at the back stairs laboratory. What is really needful? she seems to ask. Here is a stomach with a fringe of hairs to catch its prey. That gets on finely as a water hydia. Some polypus have finely as a water hydia. Some polypus have one stomach in common and thrive very well, indeed. Sometimes the tiny animal has but one foot which it uses as an oar, a spade or a hook at will. Sometimes it has many legs and hook at will. Sometimes it has many legs and pro-legs, of unequal lengths. Now the legs will be arranged in two rows like a caterpillar, and again in a circle like the spider's. The eyes may be anywhere, and they may be compound eyes with any number of facets, or they may have several pairs of eyelids, thick and thin, according to need. You can hardly imagine any sort of weapon or defensive device that is not in use by some insect or other. Beside their wings for flight and their own special weapons, horns, claws, beaks, etc., they have side their wings for flight and their own special weapons, horns, claws, beaks, etc., they have every evil device ever known to man; lassoes ingeniously coiled, marks and disguises to conceal their real character, tubes of poison to kill or benumb, the hidden daggers of their sharp sting and all sorts of traps and pitfalls. Yes, certainly here have been tried and tested all things for the primitive life—the capture of load for its devouring hunger. Ways of escapfood for its devouring hunger, ways of escap-ing or over-coming an enemy, devices of the householder for the preservation of its young, though it must be owned these are often of the though it must be owned these are often of the simplest. If eggs, they are dropped in a safe place, or perhaps lashed together on a sort of raft and left to their fate. If the young come by budding, they are nourished from the parent stem for a while and then break off and float away to set up a new household. The simplest method of making a family is by division, each piece an entire creature; but, of thing, feeble and drawf they when it hist appears, and drawfully when it hist appears, and the and then that suppears, but it hangs itself on a nail or a twig, and stretches and stretches itself to its full size, with smooth wings glorious in color, and at last floats away to revel in sunshine and thrown open to the public, it will no doubt become one of the most famous resorts in the country.

There is something that even looks like a moral choice here, for it is said some individual of a small cabin. Immediately upon entering course, as the animal grows more complex, has more organs, and more intelligence, this method is put aside. Nothing is more wonderful than the instinct with which some insects provide for the children they will never see. They have never known parents, they will never know their offspring, yet they store up food, they spin silken coverlids, they choose safe shelter. Does not one come near a Divine Father's thought here?

There is a wealth of color, grace, fancy in the decoration of these almost invisible cradles and homes. The butterfly eggs look like Mosques and Minarets of a Moorish city in their rich, fantastic arabesques and twisted coils. Some of the stalls on the Azore Islands might be mistaken for grains of sand, and yet each one, in its curve and recurve, is,

"A work divine,

Other insects weave together leaves in bowers of greenery. We find even the grotesque in perfection in the humorous caddis-worm, who covers itself with pebbles and bits of wood until it is quite invisible.

Beauty is given with full hands to the min-

Beauty is given with full hands to the minute things of air and water. Do you notice the dust or powder on a moth's wing that makes it so soft and velvety? Each grain of this dust is a perfect plume. Look at the jelly fish, how they throb and flicker with beautiful colors and lights! How freely is every little creature decorated with a glitter as of gold or silver!

The beetle of Brazil, one of the hard, horny beatles, which is a privales amount. beetles, shines like a priceless emerald. The fireflies, the glowworms, thousands of seacreatures, are their own lamps as well as lampbearers, and light the whole region where they are.

No one can make acquaintance with dwellers No one can make acquaintance with dwellers in the sea, or the invisible neighbors of the microscope-world, without growing keenly interested in their life-histories, full of changes and adventures. The simplest insect begins as an egg, with its store provided with strange foresight, then it is a worm or caterpillar with all sorts of disguises from its many enemies,—protective coloration, and queer attitudes, so that it looks like a leaf or a twig or a bit of moss; hiding-places ingeniously constructed in the leaves, and what is odder still, this pulpy, helpless thing erects its homes, lashes itself from side to side, as if it were a furious beast, to keep away its smaller foes! Next comes the curious self-burial, the long, trance like sleep, and the awakening as a butterfly with its grave-clothes or old skin rolled in a heap, and the sepulcher or chrysalis-case rent apart. It is an old-looking, wrinkled, ugly neap, and the sepulcher or chrysans-case rent apart. # The Most Wonderful Cave in the World.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HEN Mammoth Cave and the great Caverns of Luray were discovered they were considered the most wonderful in the world, but with-in a few years, a much more marvelous one has been found in South Da-kota, called "Wind Cave." The United States Government has secured control of the cave the majes-tic extent and wonderful formations of which have been but little described and seldom pictured. As at present managed, but seven miles of the ninety miles of passage ways and chambers which have been invaded by discoverers are open to sight seers. Many of the most gorgeously altared and tesselated rooms are accessible only after considerable exertion, but under the handiwork of the Government's agents these will have passageways opened or bridges thrown across the narrow chasms, so that the trip can be made not only with safety, but comfort

In Wind Cave ninety miles of underground passageways have been explored, opening up an aggregate of twenty-five hundred rooms or chambers. The entire distance is possible to be traversed without danger or discomfort, and when the cave shall have been equipped with electric lights, according to the plans suggested to the Government officials now in charge, with bridges over the few narrow chasms which are to be encountered, and the cave thrown open to the public, it will no doubt become one of the most famous resorts in the quire exertion either in descending or ascenaing.

The first of the peculiar formations to be found is a room about twenty to thirty feet in size. The entire side walls and ceiling is of "box-work," consisting of small squares from two to four inches in diameter, and about the same in depth, opening outward and possessing the general appearance of the tiers of boxes in a post-office. The formation is the first process of crystallization, the crystals being very fine and of a reddish brown, similar to the color of the surface soil and rock. From its appearance this room has been called the "post-office," and in the boxes repose the cards of thousands of persons who have visited the cave.

Two or three rooms farther in comes Odd Fellow's hall, two hundred and thirty feet below the surface, and a much larger room than the preceding chambers, but with the crystallization still in a formative state. Beyond this the real beauties of the place begin to be seen. The first change in formation noticeable is that the crystals are growing "crummy" in size and whiteness, in each succeeding chamber becoming harder in appearance and larger in size until the "popcorn" formation is met. This is the first indication of stalactite and stalagmite, and it has been named "Dripstone Paradise."

From this point the descent is more rapid, yet not so great as to be uncomfortable. As each cavern is now reached through passageways of fair width and a happy dryness, one of the guides hastens in advance to the opposite side and strikes calcium lights, whose brilliance of the strikes of the strikes calcium lights, whose brilliance of the strikes of the strikes calcium lights, whose brilliance of the strikes calcium lights, whose brilliance of the strikes calcium lights, whose brilliance of the strikes calcium lights. side and strikes calcium lights, whose brilliancy is reflected far into the darkness above and to the walls on either side, which are here of the hardest crystal formation, niched and carved, polished and scintillating, a veritable palace of diamonds.

Four miles of crystal caverns are traversed from this point, each possessing some point of beauty more interesting and wonderful than has before been seen, the Crystal Palace at the end of the journey forming a climax to an entrancing pleasure and sight-seeing excursion. This chamber is estimated to be thirty-five hundred feet below the surface and is seven miles from the entrance.

"Sure I was told to take him to a hotel." "And who told you to do that? It's to the inebriate asylum you should be after taking him, I'm thinking."

The porter of the Manhattan Square Hotel thrust his hands into his pockets as if to intimate that there was nothing for him to do.

"Go on!" He added. The cabby hesitated. "But I was told to take him to a hotel," he said, once more, "if he was sick."

"Who told you to do that?" the porter inquired scornfully.

"The gentleman who had been riding with him. He stopped me at the L station and got out, and told me to drive about for half an hour, and then if the gent in the carriage didn't feel better to take him to a hotel. He's sick. all right: and this is the third hotel I've been to, and they won't take him in."

"Sick!" exclaimed the porter looking in again at the door of the carriage, where a welldressed, good-looking man was sunk down in a shapeless heap upon the seat. "He's drunk!"

A nickel and three coppers.

Dr. Edward Leeson looked at the coins, and then turned his trousers pockets wrong side out and looked at the pockets.

Eight cents. Should postage stamps to put on the four letters which lay sealed and addressed on the small table in the bare room, or should he spend the money for a cup of coffee and a roll this one last time, and leave his letters as they were with the chance that whoever found him dead would be kind enough of heart to forward a suicide's last letters to the persons to whom they were addressed?

"I'll chance it," he said, almost smiling once more at the grotesque gruesomeness of the gamble. "Heads I buy stamps; tails, coffee."

The nickle spun upward from his thumbnail, and whirling in the air fell clattering on the wooden floor. The big V inside the laurel wreath showed plainly.

"Tails!" the young man said, stooping to pick up the coin from the floor. "Coffee it is, then." Locking the door behind him he went out into the street.

Just why so young and well educated a physician as Dr. Edward Leeson had come to be in a place where he had deliberately decided that he no longer cared to live, was his own business. No doubt he was more or less to blame There was a woman in it, too, naturally. A long hard struggle to get a profession had been with you?"

"You understand, now, do you?" he asked, and then added, "Have you got much money with you?"

followed by a harder struggle to get a practice. Now the game was up, he told himself-or rather not worth the playing longer, and he would withdraw. He had spent the night putting the few things he had left in order and in writing the letters now lying on the table. Thanks to his doctor's drugs—if a scanty remnant-the means for carrying him over into the great Unknown was at hand. As soon as he came back from the street the voyage was to be undertaken.

"Sick!"

The ear of a doctor caught the word unconsciously, and passed it on through all the whirling thoughts in his mind to where it made an impression on the brain.

Dr. Leeson taking a short cut across Manhattan Square to his lodging place from the cheap restaurant where he had been taking his meals of late, stopped beside the open door of the carriage standing in front of the hotel. Leaning out from the curb stone he closed his fingers around the wrist of the unconscious man huddled down on the seat.

"Is he sick, sir?" the driver asked.

"Or drunk?" said the porter.

"He's sick, all right," was the answer. 'Better get him inside at once."

The carriage was driven around to a side door, and the man was soon laid on a couch in one of the hotel rooms. The doctor felt his pulse again, and opening his clothing laid his ear over the sick man's heart. Then, first one and then the other, he raised the lids of the tightly shut eyes.

"I thought so," he said, as he stood up again. "He's been drugged."

He pressed the electric button beside the door, and while a hall boy was coming from the office wrote out two prescriptions. "Get these filled at the nearest drug store," he said, "as soon as possible." "Will I have them charged?" the boy asked,

'or pay for them?"

"Charged," was the answer. "Go, quick!" An hour later the man on the couch was slowly coming back to consciousness. His eyes were open. The first word he said was

'time," and then, over and over again, "What time?" "Is there time?" Finally, as if with one desperate effort to rally his faculties, he said. "Are you a doctor?" "Yes."

"Can't you give me something to clear my head for just five minutes, so I can think? No matter what happens to me afterwards."

The doctor hesitated.

"Can't you?" the man said again, and half whispered, "A fortune depends upon it." "Yes," said the doctor; and taking a hypodermic syringe from his pocket, filled it from a tiny vial and thrust the needle into the man's arm. The effect was almost instantaneous. The sick man's eyes cleared and his tongue was no longer thick.

"Why, I'm all right," he said.

"Better say what you want to, quick," the doctor said. "You won't be all right long." Instantly the sick man's manner became that of the keen business man, accustomed to think and act promptly.

"Do you know anything about stocks?" he asked.

"Something," said the doctor in surprise, reflecting grimly to himself that if he had known less about stocks-or more-he would not have been in need to kill himself that morning.

"My name is John Dix," the man on the couch said. "I was drugged and robbed in that carriage this morning by a man whom I have always trusted."

He felt in his pockets. "The only thing he took from me was a key to a safe deposit box in the Park Trust Company's building. In that box are twelve hundred shares of Oregon and Atlantic stock. Did you read the papers yesterday?"

"Yes."
"Then you know there is a corner being worked in that stock, and that $350 a share was offered for it yesterday. It will go to twice that figure today. The man who stole my key means to get that stock, sell it, and get clear.

"Would I have died?" he said suddenly changing the subject, "if I had not fallen into your hands in time?"

"You might," replied the doctor.

"I thought so.

"The only thing that will stop him," he said, going back to his former subject again, "is that two keys are necessary to open the box. My brokers have the second key. He will find that out in time and try to get it. The brokers are Kohl & Thomas, on Broadway. Can I get down there?"

"No," said the doctor promptly.

"Then you must go for me. Tell them what I have told you, and tell them to sell the stock on their best judgment. If you can't get hold of the man who did me up, and get my key from him, blow open the box. Here! Give me that piece of paper."

He wrote on the back of a prescription blank an order to the safety deposit company to do the bearer's bidding, even to blowing open his strong box, and signed it.

"Take this, then." He pulled out a roll of bills, and handed it to the physician. "Now go down stairs the first thing, and telephone to Kohl & Thomas to wait all business of mine until you get there. Come back here before you start down town."

When Dr. Leeson came back from the telephone, ten minutes later, it was to find his patient unconscious again. For a whole minute the young physician stood looking down at the senseless man.

He had in his pocket an order which would place a million dollars' worth of negotiable securities in his hands. He knew that the man before him, if left alone, would never rouse to consciousness-would slip silently and gently out of life into that Unknown which he himself had thought to have explored before that time. Why was not one man's life as good as another?

This was the mere man's nature, and only for a moment did it hold sway before the higher nature of the physician asserted itself. The physician's first duty was not to himself, but to his patient—to that helpless creature on the couch. Dr. Leeson rang for a bell boy and began mixing some medicine in a glass.

"Give that man a spoonful of this medicine every half hour until I come back," he said. "and do not leave him alone."

A public automobile was halted in front of the hotel when Dr. Leeson hurried from out the house. As he had come through the office he had seen that a clock there had marked half past one. He pulled the roll of bills which the man had given him from his pocket and unrolled it for the first time. There were one, two, three "C's" on the outside, and twenties, tens, and fives within them. Taking out a ten he gave it to the driver, and springing into the automobile said:

"Get me to Kohl & Thomas' on Broadway as quick as you can. If you get me around in season to do what I want to do I'll double that."

The driver grasped the lever of the machine, and guiding it dexterously out of the crowded street into Madison Avenue, turned on power enough to send it flying down that always semi-deserted thoroughfare at a speed which set at defiance all the city ordinances against fast driving.

As they crossed at Madison Square into Fifth Avenue, a policeman shouted to them to stop, but his cry was left behind. On, on they went, down lower Fifth Avenue. Pedestrians fled to the sidewalk, and the drivers of wagons swore roundly. Another officer, and still another, hailed them. Washington Square was passed and then, in spite of all the driver's skill, a block of teams was struck which hindered them. A policeman, puffing, caught up and grasping the side of the machine cried: "Stop that, I say! I arrest you!"

The doctor thrust a twenty dollar bill into the officer's hand.

"Arrest me all you want," he said, "only don't stop me now. Get in here and stay with me." The block had been broken. The wheels of the machine were already beginning to move. The officer leaped to a seat beside the doctor.

"What the hell?" he began, tucking the money inside his blouse. The rest of his question was drowned in the rattle of their flight.

The head of the firm of Kohl & Thomas himself went with Dr. Leeson to the safety deposit building. While preparations were being made to blow open the strong box rented to John Dix the man who had walked in to make another attempt to get into the box, and the policeman who had Dr. Leeson in charge arrested him also. With the help of the keys the box was quickly opened, but the delays had been so many that when the broker finally held the securities in his hands it was quarter to three o'clock; and the stock exchange closed at three.

The history of that day in Wall street in the summer of 1901 will be told as long as this country exists. White faced men bid up and up for Oregon and Atlantic stock until a thousand dollars was being offered for a share. Kohl & Thomas sold the stock belonging to their client for over a million dollars, and the men who bought the stock thought it cheap at that, for the name and honor of a great banking house were saved by the trade.

Dr. Leeson, having squared the policeman to let him off without bail, and having seen the officer's other prisoner taken to the lock-up, hurried back to his patient, whom he found still unconscious. In time, though, although it took much greater effort than the first time, the man was sufficiently recovered to be taken to his home He insisted that Dr. Lesson—to whom he de clared reasonably enough that he owed his 18 -must go with him, and when he had recovered and the physician's circumstances  $u_{\rm c}$ known to him, did not rest until the does was established in a practice more lucration than his wildest dreams had ever pictured.

And that is why the charm on Dr. Edward Leeson's handsome gold watch chain is just a plain nickel five cent piece, set so that the side which shows the letter V inside the laure! wreath is always uppermost.

consists of two straggling rows of log stractures and boasts as municipal ornaments doctor's cabin, three whitewashed stores and two saloons.

It is here that miners and cowboys come to shake off the solitude of their callings. There is company, whiskey, gossip of the outside world, poker in either saloon and three card Monte on a blanket in the open, presided over by white or Indian manipulators. The hitching rails before the two saloons are usually lined with ponies, indicating a brisk business inside, and the plaza is never deserted. There are disputes and wranglings, which if not at all times followed by shooting frays, create an atmosphere conducive to that diversion. Indeed, such is the proclivity of Little Creek for entertainment after the wild tastes of her pstrons that no man "goes broke" without a hot. exciting run for the money; and such being the quest there follow no regrets.

There was no law in Little Creek in 1898 higher than public sentiment and there were no rulers other than the publicly supported celebrities.

These roles fell justly upon two cowboys of repute who had come into the new country a independent stock men. Though young, they were men of wide experience throughout the limits of the Great Western Cow Country. After the cowboy fashion they were mild spoken, but no exteriors ever covered more untamed tempers then theirs. Therefore no be-littling "short handles" had accrued to their interrupted. I'm not mistaken. You're the be cut to Mose and Lige.

In the public eye each man had his distinct prestige. Tilford was a skillful arbitor of disputes over stock rights between the Indians and cattlemen. Through his friendship with Yellow Wolf, the old chief, Tilford managed grub, I'm going to send you prospecting for a to share peacefully during the dry months, the water supply to which the Indians held flawless claim. Allen had put a notch in his own score of public achievements to equalize this by winning a complete victory over Tilford at the fair and games in which Little Creek annually indulged.

It cannot be said that the two cowbovs were not rivals. It also cannot be said that they were, until, without their knowledge, Little Creek placed them as such by betting upon which cowboy would first place his brand on a certain four year old stallion that was running wild in the hills.

The animal in question was a prince of his kind and necessarily attracting attention enjoyed a reputation that seemed hardly true. In the summer of 1898 he was a continual challenge to the ability of either Tilford or Allen, and as both of the cowboys had publicly accepted the challenge, the rest of Little Creek extended the courtesy of "hands off."

During one of the long absences of the two men the expectancy that Allen's big "A" or Tilford's triangle in triangle would speedily reach the coveted mark developed at Little Creek and the town awaited with keen excitement the return of the two men; an event which promised to enrich one half of the population at the expense of the other.

It was therefore with no little surprise that the two men learned of the game in which Little Creek had indulged during their absence and the parts they had been expected to play. Both men were in the Paris. Allen's face took on a foolish smile. Tilford laughed. "I'll go it, Lige," he said.

"'Tis about time a rope was on the little cuss," returned Allen complacently, the truth being that his brand was already a day old on the stallion and he was still sore from the struggle that had left the spirited animal comparatively tame and tractable. Allen's vanity. however, was touched, and not content with stealing a legitimate march, he grasped the chance of adding the laugh of a practical joke played at the expense of his would-be competitor. He therefore agreed to the proposition with a sweet sense of irresponsibility, regretting only that for appearances he would have to set out for the Big Hole region sooner than he had intended.

During the absence of Allen and Tilford, just mentioned, the first professional gambler to set foot in Little Creek became a familiar fixture at the poker tables. To his eye the busy little Yellow Wolf happened to know had undertown with its constant stream of transient cowboys and miners was simply a bonanza the hands of Elijah Allen. Scenting trouble awaiting a clear up.

This gentleman, who took the sobriquet of Wizard, had left his real name as well as his latest photograph somewheres in the Chicago rogues' gallery. Since then he had been moving along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, staying in a place as long as local sentiment would allow; then taking to the trucks of the first west bound freight until the next locality was reached. He therefore stepped from the semi-weekly stage at Little Creek not only with a realization that no town in Dakota could be victimized with the lucrative returns here offered, but also with a belief that he had stepped beyond the long arm of the law.

True, Little Creek was a bonanza town, but disastrously for the gambler's vision, the law of that town which was sentiment, was wielded by the very man the gambler could least afford to meet thus invested. He had not counted upon recognition. As it was he entered into the life of Little Creek, became an adept gossip of local events; became thoroughly Allen, the wagers upon them, and all the while trickery and harvested the beginning of a for-

After the compact at the Paris, Tilford and Allen strode across the plaza and stepped into Jackson's. The men at the tables called out salutations. The gambler took a quick glance and continued his play. Allen went over to the bar, but Tilford keeping his eyes on the gambler slowly approached his table.

He had recognized the Wizard at once as his partner in a game of cards at Glen Dive, North Dakota, several years before. The game had cost Tilford a year's wages and the salable parts of his outfit. Upon regaining his sober senses the victimized cowboy had intended shooting the gambler but as that would entail the added chagrin of borrowing a gun, he finally put it off and left peaceably with empty pocket and stomach. This was merely a passing event in the gambler's career but to the cow-lot, leaving them spoken of as Moses Tilford coyote that bled me back east. Took every red and Elijah Allen, which upon intimacy might I had and sent me prospecting for grub. Now this ain't a conundrum I'm giving; it's dead straight talk. You ain't playing fair. These since. I've been keeping tab on him. I didn't boys don't know it but I do and my word is know where the black stallion was so I folgood here. We can't stand your kind here you understand. Now you sent me prospecting for new town, and you can thank me for not plugging you right here. After noon tomorrow I may show up at any time and if I find you ornamenting this here town it's tar, feathers and lead. Don't let me interrupt your game boys," and with this ultimatum that left every man standing, the cowboy backed out of the door.

The next morning the Wizard sat among the tables at Jackson's in deep thought, contemplating with abstracted gaze the brisk traffic across the bar. It was time to propose a game and there were fat pouches in town that morning to tempt a violation of the injunction. The Wizard did not fear an exchange of shots but he could not hope to brave public sentiment which had turned against him over night. The alternative was, however, to abandon his bonanza town and he was no more disposed to do that than a miner is disposed to leave an uncovered lode.

It was in the last hour of his allotted time that fate put a desperate finesse in the Wizard's hands, which if successfully played would allow him to disappear for a space of time and then return to Little Creek to guilelessly complete his clean up.

A Mexican wrangler known as Pete in the employ of Allen came into Jackson's and remarked that his boss's brand was on the black stallion. He had merely seen it; further he knew nothing. In the excitement which followed the gambler buttonholed Pete presumably to good purpose. Then the two walked up to the bar.

"It's on me," said Jackson a backer of Allen. Then remembering the injunction he laughed harshly and added, "chances are I wont do it again."

"Even chances you won't if I know my business" and leaving Jackson scratching his head over this admission, the Wizard and Pete disappeared from Little Creek.

Because this is the narration of facts as known at Little Creek it must be admitted that aside from one instance, the subsequent movements of the gambler is a mystery. Nevertheless, it is presumable that guided and aided by the astute Mexican, the gambler had little trouble in finding the black stallion and again placing the animal under control. It is a fact, however, that Yellow Wolf riding through the hills to Little Creek discovered the two men in a deep coulee a half mile away from his trail engaged in branding the black stallion which gone the same operation two days previous at merely between the gambler and Allen, however, and being too wise an Indian to mix in white men's trouble, Yellow Wolf rode into Little Creek and out again without giving the slightest intimation of what he had seen.

A cheerful week passed in which Little Creek did not miss the well-dressed fixture at the poker tables. Little Creek was not only actively engaged in preparation for its approaching gala day but was getting careworn over the wagered money which the Mexican wrangler's word had not been sufficient to decide.

"What I want to know," declared McAllister, "is why in h-ll Mose don't come in and say Pete's story is a lie."

"He don't have to," remarked the complacent Jackson.

"You've got the word of a greaser," sneered

McAllister. "Good enough for me," replied Jackson.

"Maybe, but I say he was lying," retorted McAllister.

As if in special corroboration of McAllister's familiar with the reputations of Tilford and statement, Billy Break, a cowboy of veracity rode into Little Creek with the announcement plied his craft with merciless though flawless that it was not Allen's big "A" but Tilford's triangle in triangle that was on the stallion. This put Little Creek in a second spasm of ex-

> "Give up," demanded McAllister and one half the population of Jackson and the other. "No, sir," replied Jackson stolidly. Jackson then took a piece of chalk and continued, "You've missed the point. Now Leigh's big 'A' is like this." He drew it on the bar. "Now add to it here and here and here and you've got Mose's triangle in triangle as sure as shooting. I guess we'll wait for the boys if it's all the same to you Mr. McAllister."

When Tilford returned he found Little Creek in holiday garb. Booths and bunting gave the true tone of celebration while the fringe of schooners and tents upon the outskirts which gave the town the appearance of a new gold strike were in reality a tribute to the gala programme. The mixed holiday crowd boy's pride it was a wound of humiliation still had soon become acquainted with the details of what was publicly termed the doctored brand and were waiting with suppressed excitement an episode.

> It may be said, however that while Little Creek felt trouble impending, it was not pre-

Tilford rode into town first. "Don't worry about me, Mac," he said to McAllister in the Paris. "If Lige branded that horse, he did it before he came into town last time. I knew it because he'd been in the Big Hole country ever lowed him to find out. I got in talking range of him once.

"He says to me chipper'n blazes, 'been doing any branding lately?' I saw he had a cincher ready for me. 'Waal,' says I, 'been trailing vou to take lessons in the art.' 'Better get up a sweat pretty quick,' sez he. 'Don't mention it' sez I, about as sassy as I knew. 'Some people have their work done before others have begun' and I left him pretty mad.

"Now I've come into a deal against four of a kind, Mac, drew a new hand, found them all blue and walking right up hill and before I lay that hand down there'll be fun."

Said Allen to Jackson's relief, "I put my brand on a clean hide. Pete and Yellow Wolf can prove it. I met Mose in the Big Hole. Said he'd been taking lessons of me. Said some folks had their work done before others began. I see his meaning now. He didn't like my particular design and doctored it into his! I'll make him hum for it Jack; just chalk that up somewhere as a reminder."

Allen, nipped in his own trap, thoroughly enraged, was as good as his word. Learning Tilford's whereabouts he started across the plaza followed by an expectant crowd. Billy Break leaning against the bar in the Paris had time to cry a warning before Allen appeared. Tilford rose in a flash and whipped out his gun. The two reports were almost simultaneous. Tilford slid under a table from which he was subsequently dragged apparently lifeless. Allen rocked a moment and then sank into a

Doc Bailey, into whose cabin the wounded men were carried, quickly diagnosed the cases. Allen was not even prostrated. He had been struck in the shoulder but outside of an ugly fracture was not seriously hurt. Tilford, however, had been shot through the chest and although no blood appeared upon the lips to indicate that the lungs had been pierced, Bailey had no hope for him.

It was before this bulletin was changed that the holiday crowd departed for ranch and claim spreading the false rumor all over the Bitter Root country that Elijah Allen had shot and killed Moses Tilford at Little Creek in a quarrel over the branding of a horse.

In the presence of Doc Bailey, McAllister, Jackson, Billy Break and Lige Allen, Tilford heard Yellow Wolf describe for the hundredth time the scene he had witnessed.

"l calate he played it on us Lige'," was Tilford's comment.

"On me," corrected the other.

"You played fair, Lige," and these words of Tilford's closed the matter between the two men except that when they rode again it was as partners.

What to others was a nasty piece of mischief however was to Jackson a key to the locked motive of the affair. That astute analyst took his chalk again and spent the next two days putting two and two together over his bar.

"He's playing to come back," was his gratify ing discovery, "and chances are he'll bite at the news that Mose was killed, and show up here as meek as a kitten, licking its paw. Don't you fellers see that was his strategy? Just keep mum, boys, and let the ancient law of retribution take its course."

Therefore Little Creek waited patiently, even going so far when abroad as to deny the counter rumor of Tilford's recovery, hoping that the Wizard would return to his bonanza town to enjoy the victory he had so nearly won. But time showed this to be a futile hope. Tilford's recovery spread as quickly as had his rumored death and Little Creek regretfully allowed the matter to pass into history, it having been agreed as a mark of sympathy for Tilford and a matter of just concession to Tilford's supporters that all wagers should be declared off.

It was the last night of the old year. The 'folks" had gone to the village to attend a 'watch night" service in one of the churches. Mrs. Root and her sister, Mrs. Sarah Parmenter, who lived in Iowa and was making a longlooked-forward-to visit to her old New England home, had elected not to go to the meeting. "Some one will have to stay at home to keep fire, anyway," Mrs. Root had said.

"Hearing that clock strike," said the farmer's wife, after she had got comfortably settled in her chair, "makes me think, Sarah, that with all we've talked about the things that have happened here late years, I haven't thought to tell you about the strangest one of all and that is the goings on about the Butler place."

"You mean the Grandfather Butler place?" inquired Mrs. Parmenter. "The one where the old man lived, with Eunice to take care of him? By the way, what ever became of Eunice? She was about our age, wasn't she?"

"A little older," was the reply. "It was about her that the strange part of it all happened. You see Eunice was not really any relation to Grandfather Butler. She was a girl they took to bring up, to help about the house when the children were small; but after she got grown up she took right hold just like one of the family, and when the other children had all died or got married and gone away, she was the only one that stayed to make a home for the old man. to stay and take care of the old man when he needed her.

"Grandfather Butler lived and lived, until he had got to be ninety-something when he died. Everybody supposed he'd provided for Eunice, because he was well-to-do; but he didn't, it seemed, and when the old man died the estate was settled according to law, and as she was not a legal heir she didn't get anything.

"There were only two heirs left by that time, one the son of the oldest boy, who lives in Chicago, and the other she that was Jane Augusta Butler's only child, a Mrs. Trotter, who lives in Boston. They divided the property up so that the home place here fell to Mrs. Trotter. Folks thought they'd at least give Eunice the house, or do something for her for all she'd done—everybody was provoked with the old man for dying and not providing for her—but land! they didn't do anything of the kind. Mrs. Trotter said the place was just what she had been wanting for years, for a country home. You know it is a big old house, with lots of old-fashioned furniture in it such as folks set such store by now. Mrs. Trotter said you couldn't buy a house with such an 'atmosphere'—whatever she meant by that—and that she wouldn't part with a thing that was in it. So she turned Eunice out, bag and baggage—though there wasn't so very much of the latter—and came up here in the summer to live, bringing her servants with her, and having a lot of company. Eunice went to keep house for a widower over in Glenbank. I was told—on good authority, too—that she asked Mrs. Trotter if she couldn't stay and work for her—because she was so much attached to the place—and look after the house the year round, but that Mrs. Trotter told her she didn't want to have any but trained servants. I don't suppose she meant to be insulting. She probably didn't know any better. Eunice Butler never was anybody's servant; she was always one of the family.

One of Mrs. Trotter's trained servants had behaved so scandalous—from drinking, folks said—that she had been obliged to let her go, and being left short-handed with company, she hired Ellen Watkins to help out. "Well, the upshot of it was they lugged old Grandfather Butler's tall clock that had always stood in what was his room, and had been left there when he died, out into the kitchen. It stopped it of course, but they started it going again, and one of the men set it by his watch. Just as the long hand marked two minutes to twelve, the music stopped—it was a piano—and everybody stopped talking and laughing and dancing, and stood still where they were. Ellen said it was a real pretty sight, for there were some children; and the women were dressed to kill.

"When Ellen told me about it it made me think of the time I was in Boston, a number of

That was when Phillips Brooks was bishop. I had read so much about him I wanted to see him. The church is just grand, and it seemed so great and solemnin the night time, although it was packed full of people. We went early and had good seats. The singing was beautiful. Then Bishop Brooks went up into the pulpit and preached a little sermon—only it didn't seem like a sermon, either. He just talked, and what he said came right home to everybody to comfort and help them. At least I know it did me. When it was almost midnight he stopped a minute, and then looking down at the people, he said, 'The old year has only five minutes more to live. What the new year will have for us, no one of us can know. Let us spend these last few minutes in silent prayer to God that whatever it is that is to prayer to God that whatever it is that is to come to us whether joy or sorrow, we may be given strength and wisdom to live so as to do the most good possible for God and for the

"When the last note had struck, Bishop Brooks stood up—you know he was a tall man, and grand looking—and looking down on the people he said, 'Friends, dear friends, I wish you all a happy, a very happy'new year.'

"He died a few weeks after that. I've always been so glad I saw him that time."

"Yes,'' said Mrs. Parmenter, "he was a good man."

"Well, do you know, that was old Grandfather Butler's will; and it left the place to Eunice with everything in it and a good bit of money! How or when that old man ever came to put it in the clock nobody ever knew; but it was a good will all right, properly signed and sealed. It might have been there until doomsday, though, and not been found, if moving the old clock hadn't shook it down to where it caught in the works somehow.

"I don't say Mrs. Trotter would have destroyed the will if she had found it alone—although I can't say I ever liked the looks of her—but as it was, it was found so public she couldn't do anything but make the best of it. She picked up as soon as she could after new year's and went back to Boston for good; and Eunice moved in and has lived there ever since, as happy as she could be."

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY SARAH E. GANNETT.

HE day was a scorcher, and in the crowded express train the passengers were in the last degree of discomfort from heat, cinders, dust and smoke, and many were their ways of showing consequent irritation. Babies were crying, children quarreling, an old lady was scolding the porter because he had opened the ventilators, while another, across the aisle, sat ready to annihilate him if he should dare to close them, and two gentlemen near were engaged in a stormy argument on the policy of expansion. One group, however, bore their trials patiently and uncomplainingly. These were a gentleman of thirty-five or forty—a foreigner, evidently-tall, slender, blue-eyed, and with an unmistakable air of good-breeding and refinement; his wife, four children and three servants. Several times during the day the gentleman had addressed the conductor in his imperfect English on matters connected with the journey, and at last, as the train drew out of Wilmington, Delaware, the conductor approached him, saving:

"The next station is your stopping place, sir." Five minutes later the family were standing on the station platform of the little town of Maitland, alone in their new home.

The two women sat silent for several minutes. "But to go back to my story," said Mrs. Root. "I got clear off the track, didn't I?
"Well, they stood in the kitchen waiting for the clock to strike; and it didn't strike. That is, not at first. When the hands got to twelve, and the folks all standing there, they could hear the works in the clock going, and a sort of rustling. Then finally it began to strike—'one—two—three' up to twelve, and then before anybody had time to say 'Wish you a happy new year,' thirteen!

"It was so strange, and seemed such a bad in the station platform of the little town of Maitland, alone in their new home.
Since early youth Ivan Istrovitch had felt that living in his native land, Russia, was like sitting over the crater of an irregularly active volcano, and never had he dared to freely speak his mind on any subject through fear of ban-ishment to the horrors of a life in Siberia. His father was a talented lawyer in St. Petersburg, and had amassed his wealth solely from the practice of his profession. He had given Ivan the best education to be had, hoping he would follow in his footsteps, but the boy's norror of the system of police surveillance practiced in Russia was so great that he could not be persuaded to adopt a profession but begged that he be allowed to become a steel manufacturer. He had applied himself assiduously to business, and had soon become rich, but his haunting fear prevented him from enjoying his life, and at last he began, secretly, to make preparations to remove to the United States. Through a friend he purchased an interest in a steel business there, and leaving his father to close up his affairs in St. Petersburg, he quietly set sail for America.

will serve to render your house homelike to him, and if he in dies Siberia you will cherish them."

Ivan's eyes glistened, and he grasped the other's hand. "I cannot thank you," he said, "and I cannot now offer to repay you, for inced all my money; but some day, if we both live, you shall know how highly I appreciate all you have done for me."

We cannot follow our hero in his lonely journey across the continent. We cannot even sail for America.

business there, and leaving his father to close up his affairs in St. Petersburg, he quietly set sail for America.

Time passed, and the strangers grew accustomed to their new surroundings. Ivan thoroughly understood his business, and was so honorable and straightforward in his dealings that he won the respect and esteem of all. In their social relations, too, both he and his wife drew around themselves host of friends. Thus passed several happy years, but one day Ivan came home with pale face and disturbed manner and sought his wife.

"Ritchie, my father has been arrested and thrown into prison. Why, I do not know, but I ought to go to him at once. I cannot tell how long I shall be gone, and I must go secretly for fear of falling into the hands of that horrible gang of spies employed over there, and being myself imprisoned. May I go, Ritchie? I will not go without your consent, but, oh, my darling, think of my poor father and his dreadful fate, and let me go to save him if I can."

if I can."

For many minutes Mrs. Istrovitch could not reply. With her white face pressed close to her husband's breast, and her shaking hands clutching him as if she would never let him go, she seemed almost insensible to what he said; but at last tears came to her relief, and lifting her streaming eyes to his she said:

"Yes, go, my husband. I dare not keep you, but oh, how can I bear it! God grant that you may return to me, and that you may either

"Yes, go, my husband. I dare not keep you, but oh, how can I bear it! God grant that you may return to me, and that you may either bring your father with you or leave him dead." "Amen," solemnly answered her husband. "My own true wife. I can never thank you for this great sacrifice of yours, but you know that I feel it. And now you must make up any story you please to account for my absence. I shall have it given out at the works that I have gone to Scotland on business, but the after details I must leave to you."

That night the train, as it passed through Maitland, bore away Ivan Istrovitch, but the man who boarded the Antwerp steamer at New York at noon of that day and took possession of the stateroom for which he had telegraphed from Wilmington, was a swarthy, black-haired, of the stateroom for which he had telegraphed from Wilmington, was a swarthy, black-haired, full-bearded man; and the name signed on the steamer's register was Nicholas Lundgren. had written to him of his father's arrest, told him who he was, and received from him full accounts of his father's misfortunes. He had been employed as counsel for a nihilist accused of plotting against the life of the Czar. Becoming interested in a professional way in the case, he had argued its defense with all the intensity of which he was capable, and had even gone so far as to spend his own money in hiring witnesses for the accused. But all was of no avail, and the unfortunate man was condemned to die upon the scaffold. The wretch, incensed at his fate, and vowing revenge, swore that the man who had so nobly defended him was alike guilty with him. With the rope around his neck, and death and the other world staring him in the face, he boldly avowed that the old lawyer was a sworn nihilist, and that he had worked so ably for him solely because he was one of the Brotherhood, and he died with the lie upon his lips.

No other testimony was required. The old with the lie upon his lips.

No other testimony was required. The old barrister's long life of honesty and fidelity to his country went for nothing against the lying rant of a criminal, and he was seized and im-prisoned, his property confiscated, and him-self, after the merest shadow of a trial, had condemned to hard labor for life in the coal mines of Saghalien.

Istrovitch was well-nigh stunned when the enormity of the injustice done his father dawned upon him, and for a time he was so excited that his friend feared that he would bring the police in upon them both; but at length he became sufficiently calm to discuss a plan which his friend thought might possibly result in the rescue of his father. All night they talked, and as morning was breaking Ivan rose to depart.

"One moment," said his friend; and, un-locking the door of a large closet he showed it to be filled with clothes, books, silver, china, portraits and other pictures, a desk and chair, and other articles which Ivan recognized as belonging to his father.

"A sale was held last week," remarked his friend, simply, "of your father's effects, and I instructed my agents to buy these things for me. I knew you would like to have them, and as soon as possible I shall ship them to your wife. If your father ever reaches America they live, you shall know how highly I appreciate all you have done for me."

We cannot follow our hero in his lonely journey across the continent. We cannot even fathom the depths of his misery as he struggled on by any mode of conveyance available tortured constantly by the thought that every day was taking him further and further from his loved ones, and that no one in the wide world save one true friend, and possibly his wife—secretly informed by that friend—knew of his whereabouts. At last he reached the shores of the Gulf of Tartary, which separate the island of Saghalien from Siberia, and at the town of Nickolaievsk found the Government vessels which convey prisoners to the island Here Ivan sought and found employment as a sailor on one of these vessels, and for more sailor on one of these vessels, and for more than a year he toiled, without once daring to venture on the island and seek the prison town who had the prisoners in charge, and at last he ventured to ask one of them if he knew anything of barrister Istrovitch who had been sent to the island from St. Petersburg a year or two before. To his great joy the man did know him, and assured him that he was still alive. Ivan dared ask no more for fear of exciting the other's curiosity as to his reasons for wishing to know, but his relief was so intense that he had much difficulty in hiding his happiness.

At last fortune favored him in the death, during a voyage, of one of the under jailors. It was necessary to at once supply his place, and Ivan was placed in charge of the prisoners until they should reach their journey's end. So well did he perform his duties, and so heartily did he curse and even strike the men that the authorities congratulated themselves on the acquisition of a man after their own hearts, and made his appointment permanent.

Ivan now had free access to the prison, but cautiously refrained from discloing his presence to his father, although he had frequent opportunities of seeing him, and his pitiable plight made his hands clench and his heart burn with agony that he was still powerless to relieve him. At last the head jailor was recalled, and our friend, who had shown himself a model jailor by his harshness to the prisoners, was given his place. It was now his duty to superintend operations in the torture chamber, and his heart was often wrung by the scenes of suffering which he was powerless to prevent or even to ameliorate. Daily he was obliged to witness the death of some poor wretch under torture or on the whipping board. He could do nothing now, but he secretly took notes of all that went on, and even made photographs of the scenes that so revolted him.

At last one day his father, worn to a shadow of his former self, a wreck in body and mind, of the scenes that so revolted him.

At last one day his father, worn to a shadow of his former self, a wreck in body and mind, was brought in to be flogged because he was unable to accomplish his appointed task in the mines. Ivan ground his teeth and dug his nails into his hands until the blood came to keep a restraint upon himself. His father was bound upon the whipping board, but fainted, as he felt sure he would, after the first three or four strokes.

four strokes,
"Fools!" shouted Ivan, "dolts! idiots! You need the lash yourselves. Could you not see that the blows should be more temperate in this case? Now you have killed him before his punishment was complete. Go, you pigs, go, or I'll kill you for your stupidity!" and the men fled precipitately, leaving Ivan alone with his father.

In an agony he bent over him, fearing that his chiding words to the men were indeed true, but even as he looked the eyelids quivered, opened, and the old man looked up at him with a growing fear in his eyes. Ivan could not bear it.

"Father," he whispered in his ear, "father, do not fear. I am Ivan, your son, Ivan, father, do you hear? I am your son, and nothing shall ever harm you any more. Hush! Do not say a word, for your life." And quickly lifting him from the whipping board he bore him to a cell opening from the chamber and laid him on a cot. Here, after administering restoratives, he locked him in, cautioning him not to make the slightest noise, and, going to his own house, sought his two servants—a man and a woman who had been convicts, but whose time had expired. He had been able to secretly show them some small kindnesses, and they never forget it, and were ready to serve him to the death if necessary. Ivan told them briefly that he found his father in the prison, nearly dead, and needed their help to get him away.

As soon as darkness favored them they carried the old man from the prison to his son's house, where they concealed him, and then, making a dummy, they clothed it in his clothing and summoned the men who disposed of dead bodies to cremate it as usual. 'Father," he whispered in his ear, "father, making a dummy, they clothed it in his clothing and summoned the men who disposed of dead bodies to cremate it as usual.

Days and weeks went by, and still Ivan kept his father in concealment, watching for a chance to get him away, but none had yet offered. Freed from his incessant toil and constant fear of punishment, with warm clothing and abundant food, the old man was gradually regaining strength both of body and mind, and was happy in the presence of his son, who had told him the whole story of his search for him, and of whom, since he understood the necessity for his apparent harshness and cruelty in the prison, he had ceased to be afraid.

One night, however, about nine o'clock, his servants came to him with horror in their eyes, to say that they had just overheard a conversation between the prison inspector and an under jailer which showed them that Ivan's attempts at taking notes of prison affairs and versation between the prison inspector and an under jailer which showed them that Ivan's attempts at taking notes of prison affairs and photographing prison scenes had been observed, and that he was to be arrested and his premises searched the next morning. No time was to be lost, and as soon as the old man could be roused and dressed in his warmest clothing, for the time was December and the cold was intense, Ivan carefully disposed of his notes, photographs and money on his own person, and, taking the two servants with them, they started in a dog team for Langra, on the northern shore of the island. They travelled at a gallop, changing the dogs as often as possible, it needing only his own name as jailer of the prison to procure them fresh relays. The next night they reached Langra, and were so fortunate as to find a vessel on the point of starting for the main land. Here they again took dog teams for Corea, and after incredible toil and difficulty succeeded in reaching the seashore and catching a steamer for Yokohama. The danger was now over, and the various voyages which lay between the travellers and the faraway American home proved a much-needed rest to the worn-out Ivan. which lay between the travellers and the lat-away American home proved a much-needed rest to the worn-out Ivan.

From Yokohama he sent a telegram to his wife, and from San Francisco another to his friend in S. Petersburg, telling of their safety. We can imagine but not describe the meeting between husband and wife in New York after their five long years of separation. Heaven had been kind to them, and not one was missing from the happy family that gathered around the open fire in their home in Maitland that wild, wet Easter eve. The old grandfather, his eyes wet and shining, was in their midst, and as he sat in his own old chair, and gazed at his familiar books and pictures scattered about the pleasant room he leaned forward and his trembling hands grasped those of his son and daughter.

"Ivan, Ritchie," he cried, "Now I know I am at home. Thank God, and thank you, my children, for all that you have done for me," and without another word the whole family, joining hands, sank to their knees and sent a voiceless prayer of thanks to Him who had safely led them through perilous ways to the glad light of another Easter day.

Stimulants were given the Sergeant, the surgeon looked to his wound, made by a bullet cutting its way through his thigh, and all watched the handsome sad face of the man, of whom nothing was known save that he had enlisted as a private soldier a year before and had won the regard and admiration of his officers and comrades. Of one thing all were assured, and that was that he had a history no one could fathom. could fathom.

"I had to run the gauntlet of course, sir, and was so fortunate as to be successful, though both my horse and myself were wounded. Captain Carney saw that the Sergeant had some hidden motive for his anxiety to save Captain Anthony, but he asked no questions, gave orders that the command should move within an hour and made his own cook prepare supper for the wounded Sergeant who ate it and then sunk into a deep sleep.

"Perfectly, sir, for I must save Captain Anthony—never mind me, sir."
In spite of his words the Sergeant had to be aided to mount, and the set lips showed that his wound gave him great pain. But he took his place at the head of the column, Captain Carney riding with him, and the rapid march of rescue was begun through the trackless wilderness.
On, on, the gallant Sergeant led the way, a halt of half an hour being made after midnight on, on, the ganant sergeant led the way, a halt of half an hour being made after midnight for a cold lunch and water; then once again the march was begun, a low moan being wrung by pain through the set teeth of the man whose indomitable pluck and will would not allow him to give up.

indomitable pluck and will would not allow him to give up.

"That man is a marvel," said the surgeon, while Captain Carney replied:

"He is indeed, and he has already more than won a commission."

It was just before dawn when the troopers swept down upon the Indian ponies and corraled them, killing their guards, and placing a force of a dozen soldiers to care for the captured animals, the command made a dash for the now alarmed redskins camped in a circle about the besieged men in the timber.

Taken by surprise, their ponies in the hands of their foes, the amazed and frightened Indians made but a half-hearted fight and then fled for their lives, for the troopers rode them down and with revolver and sabre rushed on in "God bless you, Sergeant Searle, for to you we owe our lives," cried Captain Anthony feebly, as the tall Sergeant approached him.

"We could never have withstood another charge, and the Indians were preparing to make one at daylight," said the Lieutenant commanding in the place of Captain Anthony.

The Sergeant had heard, but he made no reply. His face was deadly white, his lips quivered and he sunk his length upon the ground, just as Captain Carney and Surgeon Powell came up.

Powell came up.

Then it was found that the wound in his thigh was not the only one he had received in running the gauntlet, for he had two others, though not severe, yet painful, and these, with his bullet shattered arm rendered his condition

But he had saved Captain Anthony and his command and two weeks after all were safe in the fort. But Captain Anthony failed to rally and several weeks after the return to the fort the Surgeon came to the quarters of the wounded Sergeant and said:

"Sergeant Searle, I have two messages for you, one from Colonel Merriam, to advise you that you have been appointed a First Lieutenant of Cavalry in the Army, and I am glad to be the first one to congratulate you upon your well deserved promotion. The second message is from poor Captain Anthony, who wishes to see you, if it is possible for you to go to his quarters, for he cannot last long, and I am glad that his wife has come."

"His wife! is she here?" gasped the Sergeant.

"Yes."

"Will not go to see him then."

"His wife! is she here?" gasped the Sergeant.

"Yes."
"I will not go to see him then."

"You are able, and you must, for he wishes to see you alone."

The Sergeant arose, dressed by the aid of the Surgeon, and with an effort entered the quarters of the dying man.

"Searle Seldon, I sent for you to right a wrong with my own lips. The woman you loved, and who loved you is my wife; but hers was the sacrifice, for she married me for my riches, that she might save her parents from want in their old age, and sent you, a poor doctor, out into the world a wanderer.

"She is here now, come from her far-away home to see me die, and she saw you as she passed your quarters today, beheld your face through the window, and told me that Sergeant Searle, who nearly lost his life to save mine, was Searle Seldon, late a colonel in the Army of Egypt and for several years a wanderer about the world.

"To my wife, Seldon, I leave my fortune, and to you I bequeath my wife, for you love her as the does your and my blessing I give to you both—Hester!"

He called her name firmly and a beautiful woman of twenty-five entered the room. Taking her hand and that of Searle Seldon he clasped his own about them and said faintly:
"Now you two will know happiness."

And his words were prophetic, for in the years that have passed since then no sorrow has come upon them, and no longer are their lives divided.

looking black stone. Digging further, out of curiosity, he came upon a bed of the stuff, which seemed to lie in a thick stratum under all his land. Neighboring farmers told him it was only a new kind of rock. Shoemaker, however, loaded a wagon with the black stuff and started for Philadelphia. He took it to the Pennsylvania Bank on Second street and showed it to the bank people. "You've got a big load of nothing there, Shoemaker," said the president with a smile, as he examined the specimens. Shoemaker, disappointed, dumped his load in a vacant lot next to the bank and drove home.

About a year afterward Patrick Lyon, About a year afterward Patrick Lyon, a blacksmith, carried some of the black lumps to his smithy and demonstrated that what Shoemaker had thrown away was the best fuel of which the country at that time had knowledge. WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HERE is an endowed work,"once remarked Phillip D. Armour the Chicago beef and pork magnate "that cannot be altered by death or by misun-derstanding among death or by misun-derstanding a mong trustees, or by bick-ering of any kind. Besides, a man can do something to carry out his own ideas while he lives, that he can't do after he is in his grave." How impressive are these commonsense expression of the principle that underlies nearly all latter-day philanthropy will also explain that grand benefaction, "The Armour Institute of Technology." Like most great American millionaires Mr. Armour was wholly a self-made man, which means that his education was acquired like his fortune. Born in 1832 on a form in Madison. Armour was wholly a self-made man, which means that his education was acquired like his fortune. Born in 1832 on a farm in Madison County, New York, of Scotch parentage, he lived the simple sturdy life of a farmer's son till he was twenty years of age. Three years after the discovery of gold in California he joined the tide of immigration to the Pacific coast. His life was a series of hard knocks and many sided experiences in the West for several years thereafter. Finally after having 'viewed the landscape over' pretty thoroughly he decided on Chicago as the future metropolis of the West and here he has become one of the Merchant Kings not only of America but of the whole world. The business of the Armours is one that passes the confines of this great continent at a bound and reaches literally into the remotest corners of the earth. Armour canned meats are known to-day in Persia as well as in Chicago, New York and London. Writing five years ago of his affairs a statistician says, "Mr. Armour pays six to seven millions of dollars yearly in wages, owns four thousand railway cars, which are used in transporting his goods, and has over seven thousand thousand railway cars, which are used in transporting his goods, and has over seven thousand horses to haul his wagons. Fifty to sixty thousand persons receive direct support from the wages paid in his wag was tracking because thousand persons receive direct support from the wages paid in his meat packing houses alone, if we estimate families on the census basis. He is a larger owner of grain elevators than any other individual in either hemis-phere; he is the proprietor of a glue factory, which turns out a product of seven millions of tons a year; he is the practical controller of one of the great railways of the Northwest." Speaking of himself and his habits of work a few years ago this remarkable man said, "All

Speaking of himself and his habits of work a few years ago this remarkable man said, "All my life I have been up with the sun. The habit is as easy at sixty-one, as it was at sixteen; perhaps easier because I am hardened to it. I have my breakfast at half past five or six: I walk down to my office and am there by seven, and I know what is going on in the world without having to wait for others to come to tell me. At noon I have a simple luncheon of bread and milk, and after that, a short nap, which freshens me again for the afternoon's work. I am in bed again at nine o'clock every night."

Mr. Armour has been a practical philanthropist all his life. His private benefactions are untold, for his hand never remained shut when the cause was worthy. In his modest office in Chicago he has sat for years a true King of men dispensing wisely the wealth of nations that has flowed at his feet.

The three great monuments to Mr. Armour's name in Chicago are the Armour Mission which is a Sunday School of more than two thousand children with a free Kindergatten and free name in Chicago are the Armour Mission which is a Sunday School of more than two thousand children with a free Kindergarten and free dispensary, which the great millionaire himself attended regularly every Sunday; the Armour flats, a great building adjoining the mission with a large grass plot in the centre where in two hundred and thirteen flats, having each from six to seven rooms, families find clean and attractive homes at the lowest possiclean and attractive homes at the lowest possible rental; and the Armour Institute of Technology. This is the greatest practical Educational institution, stopping just short of university aims, in the whole world. The gifts of its promoter and benefactor to the Armour Institute now amount to about three millions of dollars. The buildings are five stories, fire-proof, of red brick trimmed with brown stone, and stand at the corner of Thirty-third street and Armour Ave. in Chicago. The Institute was dedicated on Dec. 6, 1892. It is divided into four principal departments the whole basis of the course of instruction being the idea of practical utility. In other words a young man or woman need not be exceptionally "smart" to enter the Armour Institute, nor to graduate, Philadelphia coal men are back of a movement to build at Summit Hill, Carbon county, a monument of coal to Phillip Ginter, who discovered anthracite within a short distance of that place. Ginter made his great discovery one hundred and nine years ago. He lived in a cabin in the forest on the Mauch Chunk Mountain. While in quest of game he came on what he supposed was block stone. He built a fire of wood and threw pieces of the supposed stone about it so that the embers might last longer while he was roasting a bird. In a short time he was surprised to see that the stones were burning. They were pieces of anthracite.

Ginter carried some of the coal home and burned it. His few neighbors soon learned of the discovery, but there was no mining to any extent in Carbon county until after the war of 1812 had begun. The first load of anthracite mined in Schuylkill county was shipped to Philadelphia just nine years after Ginter stumbled upon the black stone. George Shoemaker, who owned a small tract of land where Pottsyille now stands, in 1800 dug up a peculiar tute opened in September 1893 with six hundred pupils and the attendance has increased largely each year. It possesses the fullest equipment of practical machinery, working models and utensils of the various crafts in all departments. Its library is already noted for a choice collection of works on the early history of printing. What Harvard and Yale are doing for classical education, the Armour Institute is accomplishing for the higher classes of mechanical and what may almost be called of mechanical and what may almost be called scientific trades as well as the very humblest walks of life. Its graduates are already to be found in important positions in the great railway and machine shops and among the mines and mills of the west and it bids fair to become a centra virulling even the scientific schools of and mills of the west and it bids fair to become a centre rivalling even the scientific schools of some of the Eastern Universities in practical importance. Education in the modest most practical common every-day sense is given here also as it can be in no other institution in the country. Always original in his ideas and methods Mr. Armour has always devoted a great deal of practical thought to this great benefaction with the result that the Armour Institute of Technology considering the variety and character of its various curriculums is to-day the most unique educational institution on the American continent. And yet its founder believed it to be only the germ of the greater schools of the same type that shall some day dot this broad land of ours.

Certain symptoms and conditions announce the approach of fatal disease as surely as the first, faint blushes of dawn herald the mighty orb of day.

Modern Smuggling.

LL smugglers are not swarthy, piratical chaps. This idea should be dispelled from the mind of the ordinary reader. A trip with one of the customs officers by the writer, while he listened to the "declarations" of the passengers on an ocean steamer, and a subsequent call on my genial friend revealed many strange stories many strange stories of attempts to cheat their statements.

"Have you any new or dutiable goods to declare?" is the first question launched.

The listener is a woman. Smuggling is as natural as love to a woman and the chances are two to one that the fair creature before us has a selected assortment—of things that she wants to get through the Custom House without paying duties thereon. She has compromised with her conscience by selling the whole contents of her trunks to a fellow passenger, also a woman, for one cent. Consequently she can swear that she has no dutiable goods in her possession and remarks to herself as she does so that they all bemarks to herself as she does so that they all belong to her friend.

She is a trifle nervous in spite of her efforts to appear calm, and the inspector makes a mysterious mark on the document to which she has sworn. These inspectors are good judges of human nature and can generally determine whether a person is lying or telling the truth.

The inspector evidently enjoys her sufferings, cruel man that he is

"I have a dozen gloves in a box and two or three pairs loose in my trunks; I can't tell exactly how many. The presents are some toys and other trifles that cost very little in Paris and London. Whenever I saw anything that I thought would please the children I bought it."

As the inquisition goes on her nervousness increases and quite likely she would give all the goods she is trying to smuggle if she could only escape the ordeal. The inspector makes up his mind very soon that her baggage will need careful attention, and before 'dismissing her he makes another cabalistic mark on the paper to which she had sworn and affixed her signature.

One of the passengers on the steamer who was evidently anxious to get through with his "declaration" as speedily as possible is a middle aged man, who has carefully kept himself secluded during the entire voyage. He has made the acquaintance of nobody except his roommate, and even that individual has seen very little of him. The passengers are on tiptoe to hear him declare his baggage; his name is not on the printed list of passengers as he secured his accommodations on the day of sailing, and came aboard at Queenstown when the vessel touched there for the mails.

He disappointed the curious ones by handing a card to the inspector when asked, "What is your name?" To the query as to whether he has any dutiable articles to declare, he gives a prompt negative.

"Have you any piece goods, gloves, jewelry, or presents for anybody?"

"None whatever."

"How many pieces of baggage have you?"

"How many pieces of baggage have you?"
"One."
"What is it?"

"One."
"What is it?"
"A small hand-bag. I have also an overcoat and an umbrella."
"That will do. Next!"
Evidently the gentleman came away in a hurry as his hand-bag contains only a night shirt and a few toilet articles of no appreciable value. When his examination is concluded he goes on deck and is followed by a medium sized man who came on board at Quarantine with the revenue officers. The stranger keeps the baggageless traveler in sight every moment until the steamer touches the dock when he steps forward and presents a warrant for the traveler's arrest. For a few moments the latter is inclined to deny his identity but he speedily submits on finding that resistence is useless. The man who made the arrest is a detective from the office of Inspector Byrnes, and his victim has been taken in hand in consequence of cable advices received while the steamer was on cable advices received while the steamer was on

Next to him in the line of declaring passengers is a man who appears very jolly and in-clined to be mirthful with the official, but it is easy to see that under his disguise of jollity there is an uneasiness that he would gladly b there is an uneasiness that he would glady be rid of. He does not swear himself through as did the woman who preceded him, but admits that he has a few trifies of no very great value, perhaps ten dollars in all.

Next comes an honest man, or at any rate he riext comes an honest man, or at any rate he appears to be one for he promptly declares:

"I have a dozen pairs of gloves for my best girl, a dozen for my sister and a piece of silk for my niece, enough to make her a dress. The bills are all here and I haven't another thing that is dutiable. I've three suits of clothes nearly new but I've worn every one of 'em a whole day at least."

The inspector takes the bills and notes the The inspector takes the bills and notes the articles under the proper heading of the document which is duly signed by the passenger. Then a mark is placed on the back of the declaration to indicate that dutiable goods have been declared and the passenger is free to go

Next comes a woman who is evidently an ex-perienced traveler and her statement is much like that of the man who preceded her. She has several dresses; every one of them has been actually in service enough to meet the requirements of the law. The officer informs her that simply "trying on" is not sufficient, but that it must have been actually worn.

"I've worn every one of my dresses," she says emphatically. "I've dined at least once in every evening dress and as for the morning dresses they've had their share of use. I've been abroad before and have acted in good faith towards the Custom House in every way. Here is a list of all the things I bought while abroad and everything has been in use or is not in excessive quantity."

The officer marks the paper with a smile which says in very plain language that it is evident that the passenger knows exactly what she is about and is complying with the law to the letter.

So they go, one by one, till all have made she is about and is complying with the law to the letter.

So they go, one by one, till all have made their declarations. Meantime the steamer is moving on to her pier and is swung to where, she is to lie until the day of her departure. The gang-plank is put out and the passengers impatiently walk ashore to the dock. The baggage is brought ashore and piled on the dock, and each passenger is instructed to get all his belongings together and then apply to the chief of the dock inspectors for an examiner. Oddly enough the first passenger to apply for an examiner is our nervous female friend, on whose "declaration" the inspector had made mysterious marks. His suspicions were well founded. When her baggage is examined it yields handsomely. Instead of one box of gloves she has five boxes each containing a dozen pairs, and she has four dozen pairs of gloves scattered among her gowns and other transments. Every sleeve contains a pair of gloves and sometimes two pairs, and she has gloves, handkerchiefs and lace collars and the like, stitched inside the lining of a quilted petticoat. She has two dresses that have been "cut and basted" but not finished, and she has a goodly array of silk stockings and other feminine articles. The trifling presents intended for her nephews and nieces resolve into several products of the milliner's art that are intended for the wedding of a niece who is to become a for her nephews and nieces resolve into several products of the milliner's art that are intended for the wedding of a niece who is to become a bride within the next fortnight. Some of them may be "trifles light as air" but nevertheless they cost a good deal of money.

As one after another of these costly things that were not on the "declaration" are brought forth from their hiding place the woman turns red and pale by turns and her strength leaves her to the extent that she is compelled to sit down to avoid falling to the floor.

Yonder is a woman whose appearance is portly while her face is rather thin. She is one portly while her face is rather thin. She is one of the passengers who has just landed and declared that she had no dutiable goods in her possession. Her face and form are not harmonious as such a plump figure does not belong to that delicately moulded face. Keep an eye on her and see what happens.

Her trunks are examined and evidently she told the truth as there is nothing dutiable to be found. All her dresses have been worn a sufficient number of times to comply with the law and she hasn't many dresses any way. But before marking her trunks the officer asks her to follow him for a moment. The pallor of her face increases and she evidently doesn't respond gladly to the invitation.

But she follows to the room which is set apart for personal examinations and is received by a mild-mannered woman whose nose is bridged with a relief of the control of bridged with a pair of eye-glasses. She is exceedingly polite and as soon as the two are within the room and the door is locked she requests the traveller to remove her dress.

The stranger obeys while the other apologizes for the trouble she is making and explains that it is owing to information that has been received concerning some laces which were to arrive about this time. The removal of the dress shows that the work is not in vain, for concealed beneath it were enough laces to set up a small shop on Broadway, together with silks, gloves and other things which were quilted into a petticoat or deftly woundlaround the waist of the fair traveller.

Half an hour after entering the examination room the woman emerges and is allowed to claim her baggage and leave the dock. She might be detained and sent to prison for violating the revenue laws but the Custom House does not often enforce this part of its duties, except in the case of old and professional offenders. This woman, whose plumpness has vanished and whose dress now hangs about her like a closed umbrella, is a novice in smuggling and was betrayed by her anxiety of manner and by the circumstances that her form and face were not properly matched. The inspectress shows as the result of the examination a pile of heterogeneous and costly articles.

A few years ago one of the passengers on a steamer from Liverpool to New York was an elderly gentleman who was a general favorite among the passengers. He mingled much with the ladies, was delightful in conversation, had a fund of anecdotes of all kinds, and boasted that he knew all the ropes at the Custom House. He was not at all reticent about the dutiable goods that he expected to get through without the least trouble; he had an overcoat and a suit, of clothes for a friend, in addition to several suits for himself, half a dozen watches and as many sets of jewelry, together with gloves and other nice things galore. He was everybody's friend and offered to make himself useful in aiding his new-found acquaintances to run the revenue gauntlet. Many accepted his offer and confidingly told what they everybody's friend and offered to make himself useful in aiding his new-found acquaint-ances to run the revenue gauntlet. Many accepted his offer and confidingly told what they had in their possession; they gave confidence for confidence and something bordering very closely upon vows of eternal friendship were made if he succeeded in his efforts.

New York who had a clientele of fashionable people. The old gentleman was particularly attentive to her and intimated that he was a widower who wished to renew his former condition of double blessedness. As a practical test of his friendship he wanted to see her safely through the Custom House; he knew many of the Custom House people and if she got into any trouble he was the man of all others who could set things right.

The dressmaker confided to him that she

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

The great fight to down Tammany Hall in New York City, brought into prominence one of the most interesting characters in the modern arena of politics-Justice William Travers Jerome. He had brought himself into prominence by his vigor in furthering the raids and prosecution of gamblers, during the campaign of the citizen's Committee of Fifteen. He personally assisted in the raids and served his warrants in person when he had any doubt as to their being used effectively. The Justice held judicial inquiries in his court room which resulted in the indictment of many wardmen. When the Fusion ticket was nominated, Justice Jerome was chosen as the candidate for District Attorney. He made a campaign that well won and kept his name of the Fighting Justice. He was absolutely fearless and emphatic in his statement of the condition of affairs in New York. He made hundreds of speeches all up and down the "East Side" of New York. Wherever he was announced to speak, thousands would gather. From one hall to another he would tear in an automobile followed by others filled with reporters. Everywhere he roused tempestuous enthusiasm and when returns came in the Fighting Justice had received the heaviest vote on his ticket and a triumphant election to the District Attorneyship of New York. His term of office commences this month. It is safe to say that Justice Jerome will be heard from again. The people are thoroughly convinced of his absolute honesty and energy in the administration of public affairs. The Justice is a native born resident of New York City but has a love for country life. He has a fine country home in Connecticut. The house is lighted and heated by electricity and the electrical equipment was entirely put in by the Justice's own hands. He is devoted to mechanical pursuits and one room in his country home is fitted up as a workshop. He is also fond of experiments in chemistry. While fond of country life, the Justice is free to say that he prefers walking to golfing although he has fine links on his estate. The family consists of Mrs. Jerome, a young son, William Travers Jerome, Jr. who is known as "Chinky" and three dogs, a grayhound, a collie and a fox terrier. New York may expect a wise but aggressive administration of her criminal affairs at the hands of her new District Attorney.

William Loeb, President Roosevelt's private secretary, has won his way to what has grown to be an important position through merit and ability. Mr. Loeb is a native of Albany where almost his entire life has been passed. He is in his early thirties. At the age of twelve he was obliged to leave school and go to work. Two years after he was able to return to school and finish his course. A study of shorthand was followed by two years in a law office. He became interested in politics and finally was elected official stenographer to the New York ssembly. He later filled the position of secretary to many prominent state officials and became stenographer for Governor Roosevelt. He succeeded so well in pleasing the President that he was asked to accompany him to Washington when Mr. Roosevelt became President. He holds much the position that Secretary Cortelyou originally did, although that gentleman is also retained as the President's Secretary.

The Marchioness of Granby has seemingly all the good gifts that fairy godmothers could bestow. She already holds a proud title but in time will succeed to that proudest of English titles-duchess. Mere rank does not always convey distinction even in England but the Marchioness of Granby is tals-London. It is not however her beauty, rank or wealth that makes her of great interest | ti. The encouragement of a prominent editor to the world but the fact that she is possessed of that city led to her adopting literature as a of rare talent as an artist. Her line drawings of people are unique in their way. She may be said to be the only artist who has the command of line to produce the rare daintiness and strength that mark her portraits. She is one of the most sought for women socially in London and her portrait work is only incidental. Her life has thrown her into contact with the most prominent people in England and her ready pencil has drawn a likeness of these people in less than half an hour. Lady Granby's portraits are remarkable for the wonderful insight into character that they display. Her own family furnish her themes. She lost one son, Lord Hadden but she has many charming pictures of him as well as of the Ladies Victoria and Marjorie Manners and of her eldest son Lord Ross of Belvoir who is his father's heir. Rudyard Kipling, the Hon. Cecil Rhodes and Lord Salisbury are among the famous people whom Lady Granby has drawn. She is fond of the theater and there her pencil is often busy catching the likeness of some stage favorites. Lady Granby is tall with red-gold hair, white complexion and wonderful gray green eyes. Her drawings are as individual and characteristic as could be imagined, for the spirit that makes them unusual is found in every act of their talented maker.

General Sir Redvers Buller has been' retired from the English army under a cloud. He made some statements concerning the details of the South African Campaign at a banquet given in his honor at Westminster. He stated that he advised General White to surrender Ladysmith. General Buller at that time was in supreme command in South Africa but had been repulsed at the Tugela River in an attempt to retain Ladysmith. General Buller was sent to South Africa with a great reputation won in India and Egypt but Africa proved to him as to others a grave for military reputation. His Victoria cross won for gallant deeds could not save him from adverse criticism, but the recent act of government in forcing him to retire on half pay has aroused much enthusiam in his behalf in England and General Buller is quite the popular hero of the hour with the mass of the English people and of the Tucheta is the Indian name of a talented young woman of the Cherokee nation. Her mother is a full-blooded Cherokee squaw, but her father is a German. Miss Ora V. Eddleman, or Lost Bird, as her Indian name signifies is but twenty years of age, but she is the proprietor and editor of a magazine called Twin Territories, which is devoted to the interests of Indian Territory and Oklahoma. Tucheta speaks the Cherokee language but she speaks German and English with equal fluency. Her education has been of the universal rather than the university type. When she was fourteen her father bought the only daily newspaper published in the territory. The young daughter was absorbed in all that related to the newspaper and soon left school to do the work of a reporter on this paper. She says, "One day I became city editor-a proud day for me." Her own magazine is almost entirely devoted to the interest of the Indian. It is filled with illustrations and scenes photographed in the Indian's home. Miss Eddleman occupies a unique position through her work and her nationality.

One of the recent popular books, "A Japanese Nightingale," is the work of a young woman who is of English and Japanese blood. Onoto Watanna is the daughter of an English consul who married a Japanese. She is one of a number of children but has attained distinction at the early age of twenty-three. Her father removed with his family to Toronto. On his second marriage Onoto Watanna learned typewriting and began the battle of life for herself. She went to Jamaica in the British West Indies where she was one of the first women to report the doings of Parliament. Later, she came to a great lady even in that most critical of capi- the United States where she married a native of Kentucky, and made her home in Cincinnaprofession. Many of her short stories have been published both here and in Japan and two short novels have met with an appreciative re ception. Her home is now in Chicago.

Mrs. Edwin Gould is a young matron of four years' standing who has already proved that neither social success nor the prestige of the Gould millions can divert her from serious pursuits. Mrs. Gould was Miss Shrady, daughter of the celebrated Dr. Shrady. She makes her summer home at Ardslev and is naturally prominent in the social life of that well-known place. She has, however, from the first years of her marriage, identified herself with numerous charities. In aid of these she has planned and carried to a successful termination many entertainments. Her own home has been thrown open to aid in a fair for a hospital, and in December she managed a very successful affair at the Waldorf-Astoria for the benefit of a Sanatorium. Mrs. Gould is a beautiful young woman with a bright active personality and great force of character.

The celebrated French lawyer, Maitre Labori, will soon visit this country. He will be remembered through his connection with the world-famed Dreyfus trial and with that of the great French novelist Zola. Madame Labori has had as interesting a life as her husband. She is a woman remarkable for her beauty and charm. As Miss Maggie Okey she was well known in the musical world of London. Her mother kept a boarding house in the West End of London. Labori and Pachman, the great pianist, lived here and both were suitors for the hand of their landlady's daughter. She chose Vladimir de Pachman and as Madame de Pachman Miss Okey played at many of the best concerts in London and Paris. In spite of the mutual interest in music the marriage proved unhappy and the bonds were severed in this country. Returning to Europe Miss Okey met and married her old lover M. Labori. The union has proved very happy. Her musical ability is exhibited still for the entertainment

The Northwestern University of Chicago enrolls in its medical department a student who is no less a person than Princess Sophia Bamba Dhuleep Lingh, daughter of the late Maharajah of Lahore. A year ago this Indian Princess made a tour of the world and visited the different medical schools. She then determined to take the full four years' course at the Woman's Medical College, although it is doubtful if the government of India will allow her to return to her native land. The Princess is about twenty-eight years of age and fairly good looking, with a clear olive complexion and black hair. She came here from England, bringing as companions two great dogs, a great Dane and a Russian wolf hound. The Princess thought America was democratic and consequently was much astonished to find that her English maid was not allowed to sit in place at the table when the Princess was absent. The Princess's eldest brother is married to an English lady, Lady Ann Coventry. The Princess is given to wearing gowns of thin India muslin and many gold bracelets. She dislikes any artificial light except that of lamps.

No Pay Until You Know It.

After 2,000 experiments, I have learned how to ure Rheumatism. Not to turn bony joints into esh again; that is impossible. But I can cure the isease always, at any stage, and forever. I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal nd I will send you an order on your nearest ruggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic ure, for every druggist keeps it. Use it for onth, and if it does what I claim pay your drugist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't, I will pay him myelf.

gist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't, I will pay him myself.

I have no samples. Any medicine that can affect Rheumatism with but a few doses must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs. It is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that, even in the most difficult obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you. I know it and I take this risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay, and gladly. I have learned that people in general are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all lask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Simply write me a postal card or letter. Let me send you an order for the medicine; also a book. Take it for a month, for it won't harm you any way. If it cures pay $5.50. I leave that entirely to you. Address Dr. Shoop, Box 304, Racine, Wis.

A missionary is returning to the Gola country in the center of Africa whose life sounds like a romance. The missionary is an earnest educated Christian bearing the name of Wesley Putman. Seven years ago he made his way out of the Gola country and travelled five hundred miles to see the "Big Water" and the "White Men". Naked, ignorant, he fell into the hands of Mr. Putman, a missionary. Bishop Turner visited the land and sent the colored lad to America to be educated. The Gola savage seemed to possess some Yankee traits for he took a dollar and a half that was given him and by judicious investment in peanuts and apples he established a trade that enabled him to leave the school at Normal. Alabama, with a capital of some few hundred dollars. He will return to his own people as a missionary.

HE 'Nited States govument will come down here and swat you once mighty plenty, Jeth," remarked Teed Strout to The Postmaster.

to The Postmaster.

The Postmaster peered through his wicket. His specs were on the end of his nose. He was holding his thumb to the tip of his tongue seeking a little moisture to assist in scaling over the letters that he was distributing.

"Jest where in particular is your bite itchin' today, Teed?" he asked satirically.

"Tom ding ye, ye went and put that postal card in my box, message side up," Strout snapped. "Prob'ly 'fore this time ha'f the old Skeedoobles in town have read it."

"Ser'ous bus'ness, ser'ous bus'ness, Teed," "Ser'ous bus'ness, ser'ous bus'ness, Teed," chirped The Postmaster, adding, "Twa'n't a 'p'intment to the Chinese Empire as embassadore, was it?

Strout put his face close to the wicket. "Drat ye, don't ye sass me," he snarled. "Ye're noth-in' but Uncle Sam's hired man, anyway, and

"This office pays the princely sum of one hunderd and thutty-five dollars a year," said The Postmaster, drily. "'Less ye git your powder awful cheap 'tain't wuth while to fire me, is it?"

"Wal, when ye don't handle my mail right," persisted Strout, "I'll have ye fired if I have to sell a heifer caff and go to Washington a pursell a helfer can and go to Washington a purpose."

The Postmaster went at his work again.

"When ye go to Washington," he suggested, "better take along your postal card and them three blood renovator circulars ye got two months ago. That will show the govument how big your mail runs in the course of a year. When Roosyvelt sees that pile he will prob'ly have ye up to dinner. Seem's if I can see you and Ted walkin' along to the White House together discussin' the best policy for Cobb's Corner and the Philippines—Ted carryin' two pounds of steak under his arm. You'll have a good time. But what was on your old postal card anyway, that you're so fussy?"

Strout did not reply, but The Postmaster went on: "I know what it was. 'Twas a notice sayin' your two-gallon jug had got along to the express office. Goin' to stand treat, Teed?"

The Postmaster chuckled and Strout, looking The Postmaster chuckled and Strout, looking rather confused, shuffled away to the rear of the store where The Crowd was assembled. As he walked away he muttered: "I can see where there's goin' to be a clean sweep in this office, and I'll handle the broom."
"Speakin' of brooms," shouted The Postmaster, "how's your whisk'?"
Then he laughed with a big "Haw, haw, haw-w-w?"
"What's Jeth gettin' off on ve?" inquired

"What's Jeth gettin' off on ye?" inquired Uncle Sam, the dean of the Cobb Corner Cracker-barrel Congress.

"He'll be gittin' off his job pretty quick," growled Strout as he ground his tobacco between his palms. His pipe dangled at one corner of his mouth. "Some men," he continued, "when they git a job with the 'Nited States govument think right off that they're the biggest hunk of meat in the chowder. But I'll show him whuther I've got influence or not. If the govument don't use us jest right here at Cobb's Corner we can take holt and swing the place Democratic sure'n Judas Isecarrot had asbestos whiskers."

Teed jammed the tobacco into his pipe with asbestos whiskers."

Teed jammed the tobacco into his pipe with much energy.

"Jeth's gittin' so he thinks that he's a reg'lar dictator," whined old Wack Spofford, rubbing his cane head through his scrubby beard. "Next thing he'll be wantin' us to give him the nayshunal salute when he sweeps off the postoffice platform.

"When they changed the stage leavin' time a while ago Jeth had to git up at four mornin's and close the mail bags. Fust mornin' I heered a turrible wheltin' on my back door right yonder there. Says I to mother, 'Who in tunket's round here this time o' mornin'? 'Twa'n't ha'! past three. 'Land o' Goshen,' says she, 'it must be some of Marshy's folks and she's prob'ly been took wuss." And still that wheltin'-tibang kept a goin'.

"Wal, I got on my pants quick's I could in the dark and went to the door holdin' them up with both hands. 'Who is it?' says I. 'Postmaster Hackett,' says he. 'What's wanted?' says I. 'Hev' ye tackled a stamp ye can't lick?' (Git up,' says he, 'and come across into the postoffice jest's quick 's ye can.'

"Wal, I hustled over, for I didn't know what in tunket might be up. There was Jeth standin' there side of a mail bag. 'Keep your eye on me,' says he. I didn't know what in time it all meant but I watched him like a cat watches a mouse. He put some money into envelops and seals 'em up and tucks 'em into the bag. Then he locks the bag and kicks it out of the door where the stage driver could get it. 'See me do that. didn't ye?' says he. 'I did,' says I, 'but what in furynation is it all about?' 'The 'Nited States govument,' says he, 'is the biggest thing on the face of the earth and the man that is a 'Nited States official like I am has to keep his eye peeled. Now the rules pervide that when the postmaster sends away his returns and his registered letters some unprejudiced witness must see him put 'em into the bags.'

"'Ye don't mean to tell me,' says I, 'that ye've routed me out of bed this time in the mornin' jest to see ye juggle with some cussed old mail bags?'

"'I'll report ye to the 'Nited States govument,' says he, 'if ye talk that way about the great nayshunal mail service. Furthermore, I'm li'ble to call on ye any mornin' now to act as an unprejudiced witness. In the name of the 'Nited States govument I command ye to hold yourself in readiness for all sech calls. And I want ye to be pleasant about it, too. If ye come growlin' in here I'll have the postmaster-general send down one of them secret service fellers and you won't skercely know what's happened to ye when he gits in your hair."

"I don't know jest what the laws is," concluded Wack plaintively, "but it's kind o' tough to have one of them blame govument dictators right here grindin' your nose into the dirt." He made a bull's-eye in the sawdust box with a graceful parabola.

The Postmaster came along at this juncture and put another stick of wood on the fire in the barrel stove.

"Ef ye only had a bushy tail to go along with that growlity-growl of yourn, Wack," said The Postmaster, "I'd hire ye for a dog to watch the office nights. What's the matter now?"

Pierpont Morgan in the cowponcuttin' business. You fellers that buy a gallon of kairosene a month and think that you are boostin' the dividends of the Standard Oil company and makin' an independent fortune for me remind me of old Sile Bunker. Time of the Civil War he wrote to President Lincoln and asked Abe to send along money enough so that he could run up to Washington. Said that in ten minutes he could arrange it so that the whole war would be stopped. President wrote back that he felt sure Sile could stop the war and personally he was in favor of sendin' for him but he said that as usual he couldn't do anything with Sewall; Sewall was bound to fight. Sile died pretty soon after the war was over. Used to say that it made him fairly sick to figger what that war cost and then to reflect that if he could only have had ten minutes talk with Lincoln he could have saved the whole sum. He got peak-ed over it and dropped away. There was another thing that was kind of a shock and helped kill him off, I expect.

"Sile used to shingle houses for a livin'. One day right after the war closed and when banks were kind o' unsteady for a spell, Sile was shinglin' the passonage here in the village. A man came along and got into talk with the minister who was workin' in the garden. While Sile was stuffin's new load of nails into his mouth he overheered the man say that the Hou Holler Navahunal hank had failed.

around the village that Sile was poorer 'n

"'I'm sort of careless about my money matters', explained Sile. 'I couldn't remember jest what I had for bills. I run all the way home and I overtook and passed sev'ral mighty good hosses on the road, too. They asked me to ride, the men did, but I told 'em I didn't have the time to spare. I run into the house. Mother see me comin' and was at the door. I didn't notice her tryin' to open the door and I knocked her down by accident when the door flammed back. She hollered bloody murder but I couldn't stop then. In jest two jumps I was upstairs and in the bed room where we keep the big chist. "'Did you find any of the bills on that bank?' gasped the minister.
"'Not a bill on that bank and none on any other bank, nuther," said Sile. "There wa'n't a thing in the wallet. I remembered then that we hadn't had anything laid by in the money line for more'n tew year. I tell ye 'twas the greatest relief I ever felt in my life."

The Postmaster was obliged to go to the print counter at this juncture. Aunt Mirandy Bond wanted fifteen yards of a blue figured piece that her cousin had told her about. The Postmaster measured it off, nose and arm

"Jest fifteen yards", said he.

"I'll take it," said Aunt Mirandy.

"I can't let you have the whole piece," objected the Postmaster. "I sha'n't have any more left in the store if ye take it. I'll split the thing with ye."

"Wal, ye can order more, can't ye?" snapped Aunt Mirandy.

"Wal, ye can order more, can't ye?" snapped Aunt Mirandy.
"I've sold so much of this kind of pattern," said the Postmaster, "that I reckon the demand must be pretty well-cl'yed by this time. I don't dast to order another whole piece but still I shall want a leetle in the store in stock. So I'll have to skinch ye down to shoult seven or sight

Before the Postmaster went back to the rear of the store he secured a sheet of brown paper of the store he secured a sheet of brown paper that lay on the mailing table in the postoffice pen. He went to the stove, pushed past a few jiggering legs and stood in the center of the group. Cap. Jote Bailey who used to coast from Penobscot to New York was telling a story in the wavering voice of the old.

"—easy," said he. He had a hand that looked like a bunch of bananas. "The anchor laid cocked on one fluke. Wal, he just scooched and hecked his shoulder under the anchor and—uuh!—up he grunted with it. When he walked across the deck his feet sunk tew inches into the solid planks. He—"

"Look here, Jote," said he with decision, "I hain't got no objections to reasonable and proper stories bein' told here in this store. But I hain't goin' to run the chances of any Ananiasses droppin' dead on my primises.

Not if the court knows herself and she thinks she do. I'm willin' to give ye quite a lot of rope. But when ye're tellin' sech a gol-hecked lie that ye dasn't chaw teerbacker for fear of swallerin' the quid, it's time to draw the line. "'Tain't fair not to let me finish my story," protested old Jote.

"It's contrary to the rules and regulations of the "'Nited States postoffice laws to have liein' on the postoffice premises," said The Postmaster. "If the President hears I have let The Crowd set here and lie against the statoots made and pervided, there hain't no knowin' what he won't do." He spread the sheet of brown paper before his nose. "This here poetry that I was tellin' ye about," he began, but a bustling about him brought his eyes up over the edge of the paper. A new cure for

of which any suffering reader can have

50 CENT BOX FREE!

On the theory "that seeing is believing," John A. Smith of Milwaukee wants everyone to try his remedy for the cure of rheumatism at his expense. For that reason he proposes to distribute 25,000 free 50c. boxes among all persons sending him their address. Mr. Smith had suffered all the agony and torture from rheumatism, tried all the agony and torture from rheumatism, tried all the remedies known and yet utterly failed to find relief.

At times he was so helpless that he had to take morphine and after considerable doctoring he gave up in despair. He began studying into the causes of rheumatism and after much experimenting, he finally hit upon a combination of drugs which completely cured him. The result was so beneficial to his entire system that he called his new found remedy "Gloria Tonic." Those of his friends, relatives and neighbors suffering from rheumatism were next cured and Mr. Smith concluded to offer his remedy to the world. But he found the task a difficult one as nearly everybody had tried a hundred or more remedies and they couldn't be made to believe that there was such a thing as a cure for rheumatism. But an old gentleman from Sequin, Texas, wrote him saying if Mr. Smith would send him a sample he would try it, but as he had suffered forty-one years and wasted a fortune with doctors and advertised remedies, he wouldn't buy anything more until he knew it was worth something. The sample was sent, he purchased more and the result was astonishing. He was completely cured. This gave Mr. Smith a new idea and ever since that time he has been sending out free sample boxes to all who apply. In Prosser, Neb., it cured a lady of 67 who had suffered 52 years. In Fountain City, Wis., it cured Mrs. John Gehr, who had suffered for 30 years. Rev. C. Sund of Harrisville, Wis., texted this remarkable cure on two members of his congregation, one who had suffered 15 and the other 25 years, both were completely cured. In St. Louis, Mo., it cured Mrs. John Gehr, who had suffered for 30 years. Rev. C. Sund of Harrisvi bidden us good bye and our gratitude goes with them, for they were most useful in their day. Newmarkets reach to the bottom of the skirt, never longer. Sometimes they fall perfectly loose from the shoulder and sometimes are fitted in at the back and sides, following the lines of the figure gracefully without clearly defining it. Sometimes the fullness is brought in at the waist by means of a belt caught loosely about the figure and crossed in front, or fastened by means of a handsome buckle.

Too much cannot be said in favor of large collars and revers; they are in evidence on almost every garment. They broaden the shoulders, the flat sleeve top not serving to do this enough to preserve the correct proportions, now that sleeves are so much broader at the elbow.

Velvet ribbons hold their own; narrow velvet ribbon is used for running through laces that are now woven for the purpose, forming intricate patterns. Broad black velvet, two-toned, is used for belts and sashes. Black ribbons with white satin linings are favorites. Quantities of taffeta ribbon are used. Muffs and boas are made entirely of them, with the big flat rosette for garniture, with the "nail head" button in the center. Seemingly everything is trimmed with great flat rosettes of taffeta with the button center. Pink ribbons with large pink roses are used for belts and for the neck to match.

Handkerchiefs, to be refined, must be as sheer as a light cobweb. To carry when gowned in a pocketless toilet the very small "glove handkerchief" is alone possible. It is carried tucked into the palm of the glove and is both small and very fine. The French make most fascinating neckwear of fine handkerchiefs, an art that might be studied to advantage by American women. Above the hem some handkerchiefs have a row of narrow Valenciennes lace insertion and edge. The filmy hand-worked handkerchiefs of the French convent type of workmanship have only a monogram or initial in one corner and a triangular setterm in the opposite one.

gram or initial in one corner and a triangular pattern in the opposite one.

Buttons are to be used more this season than for several years past. The most noticeable novelties show combinations of different materials. A coat button, large, in fanciful openwork design, has cut-steel bars for half the space, the other half in a different design, being of gilt studded with brilliants.

Enameled buttons are shown in great variety, in combination, also plain. Cut steel and red enamel are combined in a handsome big coat button, made with a clustered center of tiny cut steel points surrounded by a rim of red enamel and again by an outer edge of steel points. Gilt and enamel are combined, and pale blue, pink and coral tints in enamel are shown in great variety. The use of handsome buttons and buttonholes bound with velvet is prevalent on imported gowns.

Among dress garniture, the revival of black silk embroidery is very noticeable and is chiefly in rococco designs. Ovals, squares, medallions, etc., on mousseline or on fillet. Another quite new combination is made with Chantilly lace as a ground. Upon this is an applique of velvet, giving an unusual effect of lightness with an accentuated pattern. Velvet is a part of all elaborate trimming.

Some of the newest veils now being worn have a general appearance of being white as the mesh and three-quarters of the dots are white, black spots only showing at intervals. Dainty face coverings of white chiffon show borders of tiny scarlet chains in silk embroidery, very brilliant and yet dainty, especially when draped about the brim of a smart hat. Black veils with large mesh are shown spotted with colors, the favorite being pale blue.

Comb sets for the hair, comprising a large back comb and side combs, are shown in tortoise shell, studded with big turquoises and rhinestones.

Sleeves of soft wool or silk gowns grow larger and fuller, while those strictly tailor made grow smaller and snugger.

The newest fancy in belts shows a handsome buckle at the back and a big bow with long ends of the same ribbon as the belt, to fasten the front.

lengths of narrow and very tough hickory cross-bars every foot of the length. Inside the hook is armed with sharp teeth.

Upon the expert use of these rather frail-looking ladders often depends human life. A three weeks' training in the school fits a man to climb up or across the tallest building in an incredible short space of time. If a fireman who has been working on the roof of a blazing building has been shut off by the burning of his ladder the pompier ladder cannot be used and the captain gets his gun. It is shaped like an ordinary cavalry carbine, but it is much heavier, the stock being of solid steel. Over the muzzle is fixed a steel cap, to one end of which a very strong and light line is fastened. The line lies coiled in a thin dish, with a core in the centre like a cake tin.

When the gun is discharged the cap flies over the burning building carrying the line with it, which is picked up by the fireman on the roof, who pulls up a stronger rope. This is made fast to the chimney or some other safe fastening. Then he puts on a broad webbed belt, to which is fastened an immense steel hook or snap, takes two half hitches of the rope around this hook and lowers himself over the roof. By grasping the rope with his right hand and the hook with his left, he can lower himself at any speed desired. The exercise itself looks dangerous, but it is preferable to burning to death in a conflagration.

cented from the bronze ax which was one of the implements first used by Chinese merchants for barter. In early days, before coin was invented, barter was usually carried on between buyers and sellers with metal implements as they still are in Central Africa at the present day. At first the Chinese used real hatchets in bartering, but as trade increased an implement was needed for the man who only wanted to buy half a hatchet's worth of goods. Special hatchets were therefore made for bartering purposes only, as they were too small for practical use. Further subdivision of metal pieces, and the adoption of a more convenient shape were then only a question of a short time.

An ingenious apparatus for estimating dust in the air has just been devised. It is capable of indicating in milligrams the amount of dust per cubic metre found in the air in any particular place. In a school room it is said to be 10 per cent. In a woolen mill 20, and in a flour mill from 22 to 28 per cent.

On February 1, 1902, an international system of magnetic observations will be established. There will be several stations in the United States, from which periodical circulars will be issued, giving the variations of the needle at certain dates. The main purpose is to ascertain the law of magnetic variation and minimize errors in navigation and land surveying.

The skull of Mozart, the eminent composer, which, since the death of Professor Hyrtl, who kept it in his home, and was transferred to one place and another, has now found its final home in the museum at Salzburg. The place of Mozart's grave is forgotten, and even for the authenticity of this skull there is only the evidence of a grave digger, an engraver and the late Professor Hyrtl.

Early in the nineteenth century Jacob Perkins of Massachusetts struck the keynote of a series of great advances in bank note printing when he substituted steel for copper plates, and devised a method of making transfers of the original engraving to soft steel, which, by being afterwards hardened, could be printed from. Through his exertions not only in this country but on the continent of Europe bank notes many years ago attained great superiority in artistic and mechanical execution.

N. S. Amstutz, of Cleveland, the inventor of a process for sending pictures over wires to distant points, has recently brought out an improved process for the making of half-tone pictures for newspaper use. Its chief value is the rapidity with which a picture of this character can be made, although it has another merit, and that is that the whites are pure and solid and not broken up by dots, as is generally the case. This makes the picture crisp and sparkling because of the sharp contrasts secured in the print.

Herbert Hoyle, an Englishman, who is the inventor of a process for making artificial silk from China grass, has been brought to this country by some capitalists with the object of exploiting his invention, and a mill will soon be in operation at Fall River or Boston. One of the advantages of Mr. Hoyle's process is that the artificial silk can be spun on ordinary cotton and woolen machines. There are a few factories in Europe for the utilization of China grass, but this is the first venture of this kind in the United States.

Dr. Albert F. Woods, the physiologist of the United States Bureau of Plant Industry, has made a scientific study of the causes which produce the brilliant coloring in autumn leaves. The immediate cause, it seems, is the oxidation of the color compounds or color generators in the cells, which is produced by the attack of a chemical ferment. The most gorgeous autumn leaves are produced by a fall whose days gradually cool from summer heat to winter snow. But if the frost should come early the true autumnal splendors need not be expected.

A patent has recently been filed in the Patent Office for a device which applies power to an automobile motor only when the driver's seat is occupied. The instant the operator rises from his seat or is thrown therefrom, the cushion is raised by means of a spring, and this carries with it a plunger which shuts off the power, and the vehicle comes to a standstill. This invention will prevent runaway accidents from automobiles. When the application for this patent was filed in the Patent Office it was found that there were twenty-six other applications covering like ideas.

It consists of an ornamented bronze pillar about fifteen feet high, with a round, overhanging top resembling that of a lighthouse, and containing a clock face barometer and three transparent pictorial advertisements, revolved by clockwork and lighted by gas from within. In the base of the pillar is a letter box, and in the shaft is a folding stretcher, with printed directions for affording first aid to the injured. In case of a street accident the stretcher can be immediately obtained by breaking a small glass window just above the letter box, taking out the key and unlocking the receptacle.

Lord Kelvin, says an English paper, once paid a visit to some well-known electrical works. At one of them they were escorted over the workshops by the senior foreman, a man of much intelligence and an enthusiastic electrician. Entirely unaware of his visitor's identity, he minutely explained the details of the plant and machinery, and lectured him in his role of layman quite professionally. Lord Kelvin's friend was on the point of interrupting several times, but an amused signal from the great master of electricity kept him silent. When the tour of inspection was complete, Lord Kelvin quietly turned to the foreman and asked: "What, then, is electricity?" This was a poser for the man, who, somewhat shamefaced, confessed that he could not say. "Well, well," said Lord Kelvin gently, "that is the only thing about electricity which you and I don't know."

There is really a wonderful demand for replating. You can do business at nearly every house, store, office or factory. Almost every family has from $2 to $10 worth of tableware to be plated, besides watches, jewelry, bicycles, etc. Every boarding house, hotel, restaurant, college or public institution has from $5 to $75 worth of work to be plated. Every jewelry, repair or bicycle shop, every dentist, doctor and surgeon, every man, woman and child you meet has either a watch, some jewelry, bicycles, instruments, or some articles needing plating.

them supplies for doing their own plating.
Retail Stores which handle hardware, harness, tableware and plated or metal goods all need a plating and polishing outfit for refinishing goods that become worn, soiled, rusty or tarnished.

Every Undertaker requires a plating outfit for repairing and finishing coffin and hearse trimmings which are soiled, tarnished or worn.

Manufacturers are making and selling tons of new tableware, jewelry, bicycles and various kinds of metal goods every month which has only a very thin plate, which, in a few weeks, wears off, making the goods unsightly, unfit wears off, making the goods unsightly, unit for future use unless plated.

Manufacturers of new goods do no replating on old goods whatever, but try to force the public to throw away the old and buy new at high prices, but this only makes the plating business better.

The more new thinly plated goods sold the greater will be the demand for plating. Plate some articles for your friends and neighbors by Professor Gray's Process, and it quickly proves to them its genuineness and merit and that your plating is much thicker, will wear better and longer than a large percentage of the new goods. Your trade is then established, and within a short time you will have all the the new goods. Your trade is then established, and within a short time you will have all the goods you can plate.

than the Queen's Christmas gift to her South African soldiers. Victoria the queen of the early part of the nineteenth century sent a cake of chocolate. Queen Alexandra sends pipes of briarwood with the royal coat of arms in silver on the bowls. Tommy Atkins may not know that "while a woman is only a woman, a good cigar is a smoke," but he will believe that when the woman is a queen, a good pipe is a royal gift.

The French Academy awards an annual prize of one thousand francs called the Prize for Virtue. This has recently been given to a poor seamstress, who from the age of thirteen has supported a paralytic father, a sick motner and ten brothers and sisters. One can hardly imagine the surprise this must have been to one who patiently bore what seemed to others a burden with no thought but to perform her duty well. Virtue may be its own reward but the world is slow to accept that theory while an act like this of the Academy awakens immediate interest and attention.

We are sometimes alarmed with pessimistic calculations as to how long the earth will furnish sustenance for its rapidly increasing population. These alarming statisticians go on to prove that with the decreased death rate resulting from modern sanitary measures and the absence of great wars resulting from advanced ideas of civilization, Nature is deprived of her natural remedies for a surplus population. In the face of this the recent action of the French the face of this the recent action of the French Senate seems surprising. An extra parliamentary commission has been appointed to seek means of increasing the birth rate and diminishing the mortality in France. It is said that at the beginning of the century France had 25,030,003 inhabitants, England 12,000,000 and Germany 15,003,003. New England has 41,000,000, Germany 56,000,000 and France but 38,000,000. This seems to indicate national decay. Zola has written one of his strongest novels on this topic and with the idea of furthering the same result that the French senate desire—an increased population in France.

The county clerk who awoke to find himself famous because he offered a gift of a cook stove to the first couple he married, must have learned a lesson from books and observation. He evidently had his own theories as to the best way to make home happy. He would probably answer the query, "Is marriage a failure?" by referring to the cook stove. He may have read the answers to the question, "How shall I keep my husband?" "Feed the brute," or the other well worn epigram, "The way to a man's heart is through his stomach." His gift awoke the press paragraphers to their best stunts in the way of jeering comment. This seems strange in view of the fact that the scientists of the day are more and more given to exploiting the theory that what a man is, is determined by what he eats. Surely the cook stove has a close and intimate relation to what one eats. The wife who wishes to mould her husband's future has but to feed him properly to make the man what she will. What better aid could be asked than that of a good cook stove? There was literature, science and common sense to back up that magistrate's belief that a cook stove was a fit and proper wedding gift. The county clerk who awoke to find himself that a cook stove was a fit and proper wedding

The American Historical Association held its annual meeting in Washington during the last days of December. The association is composed of some of the most scholarly men and women in the United States. It has already accomplished much in the way of scholarly research in the field of American history although its work is not confined to American history alone. It is almost within the last decade that American history has been given a prominent place in the curriculum of colleges and secondary schools. The association has been a helpful factor in giving dignity to the study of our own history and institutions. A wealth of historical material has been made valuable through use. There has never been a time when historical and genealogical research was so general as at the present. The American Historical Association has committees whose work covers every field of history work. The reports of the association are the most valuable compendiums of recent work in the field of history. The public is gradually developing an interest in the work planned and carried on by the association and this is a most helpful road to an intelligent patriotism.

The subject of child labor in the South is arousing general attention through an appeal that some of the leading citizens of Alabama have made to the press and people of New England. Many of the mills employing child labor are owned and controlled by Northern capitalists and it is claimed that their influence led to the repeal of legislation restricting child labor. The rapid development of the cotton industry and other manufacturing interests of the South has produced the same industrial conditions that have menaced every manufacturing nation. Restrictive laws have gradually followed sudden industrial development and in every case these laws have had the support of the most advanced thinkers of the nations. If South Carolina could place beside her magnificent cotton exhibit in the Charleston exposition a moving picture of her army of twelve thousand weary little toilers under fourteen years of age, the demand for legislation would be overwhelming from North and South alike. Figures, facts and humanity must and will remedy these conditions which are as great a blot on our civilization as slavery ever was. blot on our civilization as slavery ever was.

January, the first and the beginning of a new year, marks an exhibition of small books by the bookstores and stationers. These tiny blank books that will slip in the vest pocket are dignified by the name of "diary." The modern diary has about space enough to record important engagements and is really little more than a calendar of the "strenuous life." How different from the ponderous diaries of more than a calendar of the "strenuous life." How different from the ponderous diaries of earlier times. Few people of today keep diaries. We live in the "Now" and the patient diarist must always look back a little even though it is but the space of a day. Future centuries will look in vain for such vivid photographs of daily life as we can find in the incomparable diaries of Pepys and Evelyn. They furnish history of the most graphic power. The Polish novelist, Sienkiewicz, gives a clear explanation of the value of a diary when he says, "A man who leaves memoirs whether well or badly written, providing they be sincere, renders a service to future psychologists and writers, giving them not only a faithful picture of the times but likewise human documents that can be relied upon."

This unique volume is a collection of poems, every one a gem, and each typical of the life and manners of Maine folks. The stubborn strength of the Pilgrims is nowhere better exemplified than on the Maine coast, or in the Maine woods, on the Maine coast, or in the Maine woods, on the Maine coast, or in the Maine workshop. From the characters there to be found the author has drawn his inspiration for the poetry which he has written. His subjects are generally rough diamonds, yet they possess, under his skillful dressing, the inherent qualities from which heroes are made.

BARZILLA'S NEW YEAR'S REFORM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

Barzilla B. Brown had got out of our town in a rath-Barzilla B. Brown had got out of our town in a rether sensational way:

A special committee called round to his house and hinted he'd better not stay.

Barzilla was having a souvenir craze—he used to collect after dark,

Our cellars and hen-roosts and gardens and bins he made his particular mark.

We had liked him, you know, and we humored his whims for a pretty consid'able while,

Till he kind o' got out of the amateur class and went it professional style.

So long as he'd gathered the stuff for himself we didn't get 'specially mad,

But sellin' our hens to the markets in town was scrubbin' us rayther too bad.

So the neighbors called 'round and they made him a suit from the feathers they found in his yard.

And they gave him a ride he would have enj'yed if the rail hadn't jounced quite so hard.

So Barzilla B. Brown

Went out of our town,

Entertainin' a feelin' like runnin' us down;

But he skipped all a-whew!

When the crowd had got through

Had feathers enough, so he probably flew.

Then several years passed smoothly on And we never knew where Brown had gone.

At the store now and then some chawin' old here

And we never knew where Brown had gone.

At the store now and then some chawin' old ten would projick on Barzilla's fate.

It seemed the idea he would likely get rich if he didn't get hung for his trait.

There were rumors 'round town that he'd shifted his name and had stolen a railroad or so, —We didn't dispute it, we folks that knew Brown! He'd do it, just give him the show.

So the years skitted on till a New Year's was near, then we had a sensation in town:

For a letter arrived for our first selectman and 'twas signed by Barzilla B. Brown.

Said he, "I've forgiven the caper you played and the way you compelled me to leave,

And I'll square up accounts if you'll gather the folks at the meeting house next New Year's Eve."

So the people came early and crowded the pews and after a comf'table wait

Barzilla marched in lookin' slick as a pin and stepped to the pulpit desk, straight.

Said he, "My dear friends,
 I will now make amends,
 As a decent man ought to when kind fortune sends Good luck in his way.

So I've come here to pay,

For I'm bound to stand square with you all New Year's Day.

And I'm glad to, see you here tonight
 For I want your help in starting right."

Then he took out a check-book and there at the desk of the minister set himself down.

And I'm glad to, see you here tonight
For I want your help in starting right."

Then he took out a check-book and there at the desk of the minister sat himself down.

Aud we all filed around and we passed our receipts for the checks of Barzilla B. Brown;
Then down to the vestry the meetin' adjourned where the women had got up a spread,
We ate and made speeches till near New Year's dawn, and then we went happy to bed.

But before we adjourned the discussion had turned to a statue for Barzilla B.

For the meanest agreed 'twasn't often we found a critter so honest as he.

We were out with the band when he left the next day and his send-off was planned on a scale.

That we hoped would square up for that earlier "bee" when he rode out of town on a rail.

We turned in our checks to our first selectman but he came back from town drefful blank;
He said that they never heard tell of old Brown and he hadn't a cent in the bank.

Then we figgered the thing as a mighty mean joke that was played by Barzilla B. Brown

Because of his dressin' of feathers and tar and his ride on a rail out of town.

But a little while later we found it no joke. There were pushed up against us one day

A lot of Holmes' notes other parties had bought—and you know what the law is—you pay!

And 'twas better to settle than fight the thing out; we had to own up we were beat,

—A church full of idiots signin' Holmes' notes with the notion we signed a receipt.

When we figured it down

We found that old Brown

Hooked two thousand dollars right out of our town.

As you've probably heard,

It is often averred

That a lot of fine feathers don't make a fine bird.

And the suit that we gave to Barzilla B.

Didn't help him a tunket so far as we see.

Secretary of War Root took cognizance of the above expression of opinion on the part of General Miles, under instruction from the President, and asked him to explain his reasons for doing so. In his answer General Miles stated that he believed he had the same right as any other citizen to express an opinion upon a matter of such public interest. Secretary Root replied that the General's conduct was in violation of the regulations and the rules of official propriety and that he was justly liable to censure. to censure.

On December 20th Secretary Long notified Rear Admiral A. S. Barker, commandant of the navy yard in Brooklyn, that he was directed by the President to ask that Edgar S. At first Mr. Maclay stated that he should decline to do so, inasmuch as he was a civil service employee and could not be removed except for cause. Subsequently, however, Mr. Maclay was removed.

CUBAN CAKE WALK.

CHARACTERISTIQUE CUBAN DANCE.

BY JAMES T. BRYMN. DANCE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

OME inquiries having come, at various times, for instructions refor instructions regarding the Cotillon, and suggestions for new figures, we will describe and illustrate a few of the latest figures in New York society, ich is ever on the outwhich is ever on the outlook for new and novel ideas for this most popular form of dancing. Twenty years ago we used to call it the German. It is exactly the same thing under a new name.

Although it is the fashion to give very expensive and beautiful favors, one need not always be extravagant, for the most beau-tiful and desirable favors may be made at home at a may be made at home at a comparatively small expense. For example, large straw shade hats trimmed with garlands of flowers or large ribbon bows are one of the prettiest kind of favors.

Then there are sashes of chiffon, ruffled with the same; satin sewing or theatre bags of pale colors; big paper butterflies with gilded wings; ribbons covered with bells to be hung about one's shoulders or waist; or aigrettes made of roses or tulle for the hair.

one's shoulders or waist; or aigrettes made of roses or tulle for the hair.

All these things are beautiful and pleasing, and yet of trifling cost in comparison with the gold and silver trinkets that cost many dollars each which are given so lavishly by the millionaire entertainers of New York.

One of the new figures is called the snowball. For this, large white paper balls are prepared, filled with tiny atoms of white paper, like confetti. These are thrown by the ladies and caught by the most fortunate of the men, who dance with the fair throwers. There is genuine pelting in this figure, and showers of the fine white paper confetti cover everything and everybody.

The balloon figure consists of distributing

The balloon figure consists of distributing colored balloons among the ladies, which their would-be partners have either to capture or destroy before claiming the honor of dancing with the owner of the balloon.

In another figure each lady dancing is provided with a broom, a lantern and an umbrella. Four men are led up to each lady so equipped. One of these she selects as her partner, giving the umbrella to another, who is expected to hold it over her and her partner while the next receives the lantern, with which he is expected to waltz ahead and light the couples on their way, the last man getting the broom, his duty being to sweep a way for the couple and their lantern bearer.

Then there is the screen figure in its variations. The one for this winter is that of the women standing behind the various folds and showing their fans above the screen, the men choosing from the fans. So that it behooves the men to observe what manner of fan his favorite carries.

Then there is the Christmas-tree handker-

Then there is the Christmas-tree handker-chief figure: a small blue spruce in a jardiniere is brought in hung with the handkerchiefs of the women who are to dance in the set, the men then choose the handkerchiefs according to their wisdom and desires and then identify to their wisdom and desires and then identify the partners, or rather the partners identify the handkerchiefs.

The butterfly figure is very pretty. The women waltz round, holding Japanese butterflies of brilliant paper by strings. These float gracefully in the air and the men, armed with nets, give chase and strive to capture the butterflies, the girl being the reward for his efforts.

As flower figures are always in such favor for As flower figures are always in such favor for cotillons, it seems delightful to know of one that has a little variety to it. This particular flower figure is called "The war of the roses." Equal quantities of red and white roses are high together, forming thus a bouquet of red roses. The men march in a circle twice around the ladies, meet their partners and turn the ladies to the outside. Then the men join hands forming a bouquet of white roses, the ladies march twice around in a circle outside the group, meet their partners, bow and dance. The whole thing is extremely pretty and graceful.

As we have a continuous stream of inquiries As we have a continuous stream of inquiries regarding diet, exercise and developers,—we conclude the majority of our readers are more interested in their health and personal appearance than in fancy work,—which is commendable,—for what is more attractive than a healthy, blooming woman, who looks as though she enjoyed life to the utmost? surely, a room or house full of beautiful embroideries would not be so attractive, particularly if the worker herself were pale and sickly, showing worker herself were pale and sickly, showing

Presidents on Postage Heads of Stamps.

F President McKinley's portrait is put on

F President McKinley's portrait is put on one of the postage stamps of this country, as despatches from Washington have said is likely to be done in case the Postoffice department brings out a new issue, his portrait will be the ninth of a President to be used in that way.

As the regular series of stamps, excluding the Columbian, Trans-Mississippi and Pan-American Exposition issues, has now been in circulation with only slight changes in watermarks and the like since 1890, a change of some sort is expected soon by philatelists.

Ever since Uncle Sam's postoffice began making stamps in 1847 or thereabouts, the face of Washington has appeared on one of the stamps in every regular issue and with a single exception on a stamp of low value and general use. Benjamin Franklin's face has always adorned postage stamps of low value and has thus become familiar to people who send or receive letters ever since 1847.

Presidents other than Washington whose faces have appeared on the stamps are Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Garfield, Grant, Madison and Taylor.

Of the stamps of higher values the 8 cent stamp now bears Sherman's picture, the 10 cent Webster's, the 15 cent Clay's, the 30 cent Jefferson's, the 50 cent Jefferson's, the dollar stamp Perry's, the $2 Madison's and the $5 Marshall's.

It brings health, comfort, attractiveness, Wholly external. Worn with or without corsets. Simple, comfortable, adjustable to fit any figure. Invaluable to the prospective mother. We receive from 10,000 to 20,000 letters every year like the following:

I had been ailing for fifteen years from back-ache, headache, constipation and prolapsus. I had been treated by some of the best specialists in the country without avail. Your brace cured me. The organs have gone back to proper position and remain there.

The House of Representatives was organized by the re-election of Congressman David B. Henderson of Iowa as speaker. Two years ago he was chosen speaker and served during the fifty-sixth Congress with great distinction. He has represented his state in the National House since 1882, and has long been an influential member of that body. Like President pro tem. Frye, he is a Republican. The Democrats of the House nominated James D. Richardson of Tennessee for speaker and he polled his full party vote.

On the first day of the session an immense number of bills were introduced. Senators and Representatives vied with each other in their endeavors to first present measures of national importance. One senator presented eighteen bills and many others filed ten and a national importance. One senator presented eighteen bills and many others filed ten and a dozen each. In the House there were more than three thousand bills introduced. These bills have a very wide range. They cover everything, almost, from the report of the national bankruptcy law to the building of a memorial monument to William Henry Harrison, who was President of the United States for one month from March 4, 1841, until April 4 of the same year, when he died. Two of the most important bills presented were those creating a department of commerce, labor and manufacture, amd amending the constitution so as to define assaults on the President, Vice President, members of the Cabinet and justices of the Supreme Court, and giving Congress power to fix penalties.

Congressman Littlefield of Maine introduced a bill to amend and make more effective the act to protect trade against monopolies, requiring interstate corporations to file reports with the Secretary of the Treasury. Congressman Shackelford of Pennsylvania presented a bill to place printing paper and wood pulp on the free list, and Congressman Shafroth of Colorado advocated a constitutional amendment for woman suffrage. Other members introduced bills on different subjects during the day.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S FIRST MESSAGE.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S FIRST MESSAGE.

The first message of President Roosevelt was read to both branches of Congress on the second day of the session. The untimely death of President McKinley at the hand of an anarchist assassin has been mentioned in these columns, and the elevation of Vice President Roosevelt to the exalted position of President of the United States has also been referred to. His message, therefore, the first he has penned, has received the careful consideration of the editor of COMFORT. It should be read by all thoughtful citizens. thoughtful citizens. The document is

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

At the outset he re-ferred to the fact that Congress assembles this year under the shadow of a great calamity. He pays a magnificent tribute to the character of his predecessor and urges the passage of some law that will be able to deal with those who kill or attempt to kill the President, or any man who by the constitution or by law is in line of succession to the presidency. "Anarchy is a crime against the whole human race," says President Roosevelt, "and all mankind should band against the anarchist. His crime is far blacker than piracy and all civilized powers should declare against it." against it."

The business prosperity of the country is abundant, according to the President, not because of the existence of any human law but because business confidence has been restored. Prosperity can never be created by law alone, although it is easy enough to destroy it by mischievous laws.

Concentration of wealth in tremendous and highly complex industrial development has highly complex industrial development has been rapid and has brought us face to face with serious social problems. If constitutional amendment is required to give Congress power over the trusts it should be enacted.

enacted.

The creation of a department of commerce

The creation of a department of commerce and industries is advocated; protection and reciprocity is briefly referred to, the President taking the position that the latter is the hand-maiden of the former, and that reciprocity should not prevail to the detriment of our house industries: to the detriment of our home industries; measures looking to remedial action of Congress regarding the American mer-chant marine are strongly urged; for-est preservation is commended and im-commended and improved irrigation is forcefully advised.

Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, our insular possessions, come in for a goodly share of attention at the hands of the President. He believes that these territories should be developed on the traditional American lines, and that the men of the islands should own the farms they till. In Cuba such progress has been made toward putting the independent government of the island upon a firm footing that before the present session of Congress closes, this will be an accomplished fact.

No subject has been discussed to a greater extent for many years than the building of a canal across the isthmus connecting North and South America. This project has engaged the attention of leading statesmen in this and other countries and all agree that the canal should be built. President Roosevelt believes the enterprise should be begun, although he does not indicate whether he is in favor of any particular route. He invokes the Monroe doctrine in his discussion of the canal question and splendidly supports the idea with all the power of his strong and vigorous mind.

He strongly urges the continued upbuilding of the navy and advocates the maintenance of the present standing army at the highest point of efficiency. He supports the principle of civil service reform in every department of governmental service and says that a standard of excellence cannot be maintained until better laws on the subject are enacted. He also advocates the permanent establishment of the census bureau.

The terms of the Chinese settlement are outlined by the President. "We advocate the 'open door' with all that it implies," said he. "Only by bringing the people of China into peaceful and friendly community of trade with all the peoples of the earth can the work now auspiciously begun be carried to fruition."

The remarkable growth of the postal service is shown in the fact that its revenues have doubled and its expenditures have near-ly doubled in the past twelve years. The annual deficit has been steadily reduced from $11,411,779 in 1897 to $3,923,727 in 1901. Several other matters of national interest are treated in forceful and emphatic language by the able and distinguished chief executive of the nation.

POSTMASTER GENERAL SMITH RESIGNS.

Postmaster General Charles Emory Smith of Postmaster General Charles Emory Smith of Philadelphia has resigned his place in the Cabinet. This action on the part of General Smith has long been contemplated. He has been a member of the Cabinet since 1897 and he has only remained in office because of his strong friendship for the late President McKinley, who insisted that he continue in his official family. ### The Presidential Succession.

Prior to 1886 the right of succession to the presi-dency was not fully defined by Congress. From the foundation of the Republic to the present time five Presidents have died in office and the Vice Presidents then serving have succeeded them. In order that the succession to the Vice President who assumes the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, office of President might be confined to the members of the party dominant in the country, Congress passed a law in January, 1886, providing that in case of the removal, death, resignation or inability of both the President and Vice President, the duties of the president and Vice President, the duties of the president and fice shall devolve upon the Secretary of State. After him in succession comes the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney General, Postmaster General, Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior. When the department of agriculture was created in 1889 the succession law was amended so as to include succession law was amended so as to include the Secretary of Agriculture. These officers must be eligible under the constitution.

THE PHOTO BUTTON FAD. Popular Whim in Which Everybody Can Indulge.

HAVE you got your face on a button? This was the most common question heard on every hand at the beaches and pleasure resorts last summer, and now, thanks to an enterprising Boston concern,—the same fad is spreading all over the country and into every village where the government carries the mails. There is this to be said, however, that the pretty photo miniatures which are being sent out by mail are great improvements on the cheap little tintypes that were sold so extensively during the summer. They are genuine photographs, and all you have to do is to send them any picture you want reproduced, and in two or three days they send you the pretty photo miniature the size of the pictures printed in this story, with rimless brooch mounting, and return your original picture uninjured. The concern doing the best work in this line is the Crown Manufacturing Co., Dept. T., Box 1197, Boston, Mass. If you would like to have one of these novelties the best way to get it is to write and ask them for a "sample" enclosing ten cents in your letter and sending any picture you want copied. Although their regular price is 25 cents you can get one in this way for 10 cents, less than half price, and they will send your original picture back safely. These miniatures are very fashionable to wear on the lapel of your coat and are also the correct ornament for ladies to wear at the throat. The brooch pis back makes them easy to put on, and they cannot be lost friend will always appreciate. All the cooking utensils are of solid silver, while the spice-boxes are of solid gold. His chief cook draws a salary of £8000 per annum, and he has six subordinates in receipt of salaries ranging between £1000 and £1500—to say nothing of hundreds of supernumeraries. its greatest breadth one and one-half miles, and its narrowest point seventeen hundred feet. Here it is where the finest bridge in the world is to be erected. It will be a suspension bridge, after the American system, but in form and architecture it is to be entirely oriental. The European end of the bridge will be erected at Rumeli Hissar, whilst the Asiatic terminus will be at Anadoli Hissar. It is a historic spot where the magnificent structure atic terminus will be at Anadoli Hissar. It is a historic spot where the magnificent structure will appear, for in the year 513 B. C. the Persian King Darius crossed here with an army of seven hundred thousand men to the Bosphorus on a flying bridge. Three monumental Sara-cen Towers, crowned with glittering faience domes and minarets, will arise from the bottom of the sea, to support the richly decorated and profusely gilt bridge, which, during the night, will be lighted by thousands of electric lamps. The roadway will be supported by steel chains and it will be so high that the largest steamers and vessels can pass below it.

It is further intended to protect both approaches by a system of outerworks, and also to arm the bridge piers by means of turnable armor batteries which—themselves inaccessible to the fire of the larger guns of war vessels will be able, at great distance, to sink or disable any foreign fleet which may try to force a passage past the structure.

Most important of all this bridge will afford direct railway communication between Europe, Asia Minor, Persia, India, China and Africa. Direct trains will run some day from Calcutta to Hamburg in twelve days, from Tonking to Paris in fifteen days, and if the "Cape to Cairo" railway is ever built the Bosphorus Bridge will afford direct trains to run between Cape Town, South Africa, to St. Petersburg in sixteen days. The Bridge will be named after the ruler of the Ottoman Empire and be known as the "Sultan - Abdul - Hamid - Bosphorus Bridge." Its cost will be in the neighborhood of $15,000-000. Truly, at this, the opening of the 20th century it would seem as if we had just begun to live.

Maryelous Elixir of Life Discovered by Famous Doctor-Scientist That Cures Every Known Ailment.

Wonderful Cures are Effected That Seem Like Miracles Performed--The Secret of Long Life of Olden Times Revived.

The Remedy Is Free to All Who Send Name and Address.

After years of patient study, and delving into the dusty record of the past, as well as following modern experiments in the realms of medical science, Dr. James W. Kidd, 213 Baltes Block, Fort Wayne, Ind., makes the startling announcement that he has surely discovered the elixir of life, That he is able with the aid of a mysterious compound, known only to himself, produced as a result of the years he has spent in searching for this precious life giving boon, to cure any and every disease that is known to the human body. There is no doubt of the doctor's earnestness in making his claim and the remarkable cures that he is daily effecting seems to bear him out very strongly. His theory which he advances is one of reason and based on sound experience in a medical practice of many years. It costs nothing to try his remarkable "Elixir of Life," as he calls it, for he sends it free, to anyone who is a sufferer, in sufficient quantities to convince of its ability to cure, so there is absolutely no risk to run. Some of the cures cited are very remarkable, and but for reliable witnesses would hardly be credited. The lame have thrown away crutches and walked about after two or three trials of the remedy. The sick, given up by home doctors, have been restored to their families and friends in perfect health. Rheumatism, neuralgia, stomach, heart, liver, kidney, blood and skin diseases and bladder troubles disappear as by magic. Headaches, backaches, nervousness, fevers, consumption, coughs, colds, asthma, catarrh, bronchitis and all affections of the throat, lungs or any vital organs are easily overcome in a space of time that is simply marvelous.

Partial paralysis, locomotor ataxia. dropsy, gout, scrofula and piles are quickly and permanently removed. It purifies the entire system, blood and tissues, restores normal nerve power, circulation and a state of perfect health is produced at once. Some of the dresses were redeemed by their owners on payment of the legitimate duties and a fine, but others were never called for and were ultimately sold at auction. The other passengers who had given their confidence to the stranger were compelled to pay full duties on every article whose possession they had acknowledged. He "saw them through the Custom House all right," but his interpretation of those words was quite different from theirs. Some time ago there were among the passengers of a steamer a modest appearing woman with her son of sixteen. The woman had two trunks and the youth one, not a large equipment for returning travellers. They declared that they had no dutiable goods and the inspection revealed nothing; the inspector passed the trunks and as he was turning away he heard the mother say in a low voice to the son, "Hurry up, Charlie, and get a carriage as quick as you can."

Thereupon the officer said he would take another look at the trunks.

Thereupon the officer said he would take another look at the trunks. He did so and as he turned the first trunk over the woman turned pale and well she might for each trunk had a false bottom three inches in depth and in these false bottoms there were several hundred dollars worth of laces from Brussels. It was the anxiety to get away from the dock that had betrayed the smuggler.

An organized system was recently discovered by which considerable quantities of clothing were received in New York without paying duties. Agents of English tailors were established here and took orders for suits of clothing to be made in London and delivered to the customer here for less than he would be obliged to pay if he patronized an American tailor. The customers asked no questions; many of them supposed that their garments were properly imported and paid the required duties, but others were not so guilleless and boasted that they were getting their clothes through the Custom House by a roundabout way. The detectives worked quietly until they had all the information they were able to get without revealing what they were after. Then one day they stopped a wagon just as it was leaving the dock of a prominent steamship line, and examined its contents. It was found to contain a box and a large bundle, and the contain a box and a large bundle, and the contain a box and a large bundle, and the contain a box and a large bundle were suits of new clothing just from the hands of London tailors. One of the officers mounted to the driver's side and told him to drive to where he was going before they stopped him.

The fellow sullenly obeyed, at least apparently. He drove to a certain street and number and halted in front of a grocery store.

"This isn't the place" said the officer. "Drive to number—on Greenwich Street."

The driver saw he was caught and that the officers knew more than he supposed. He took the wagon to its proper destination and there another box of clothing was found; it had been landed an hour or two before and the consignment box of clothing was found; it had been landed an hour or two before and the consignment of opium were sent to Windsor, directly opposite Detrolt; then they were smugglers, "a large quantity of oplum was sent by express ove spread in the newspapers. The parties concerned in the smuggling cabled to their friends on the other side of the Atlantic a brief account of the affair and of course this at once put a stop to the shipments. But unfortunately for them there was a steamer of the same line then on the ocean and there was no way of communicating with her. In due time she arrived at New York and as one of the arrested men had made a full confession the revenue officers how waretly where to lay their rade. men had made a full confession the revenue officers knew exactly where to lay their rude hands as soon as the vessel reached quarantine. The parties on whom they laid them were sent to jail like their predecessors and a goodly quantity of goods was added to the pile in the seizure room.

Forty Million Dollars for Education.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WO magnificent contributions in aid of education have just been made by Mrs. Leland Stanford and Andrew Carnegie, two of America's most representations. America's most generous philanthropists. The aggregated value of these gifts is $40,000,000.

Mrs. Jane L. Stanford is the widow of the late Senator Leland Stanford of Cali-widow of the late Senator Leland Stanford of California, who, before his death, a few years ago, richly endowed the Leland Stanford Jr. University, which he named in honor of his only son and heir. Since the death of her husband, Mrs. Stanford has contemplated leaving a large portion of her great wealth to the institution, and, on the 9th of December, she transferred by deed bonds. stock and real estate, valued at $30,000,000, the largest single gift ever bestowed on any institution of learning. Of this amount, $18,000,000 consisted of gilt edged bonds and stock, paying a large revenue. The real estate deeded to the university comprises much of the property originally given by Senator Stanford, but the deeds of which were found to be illegal.

The real property deeded includes no less than 900,000 acres in about twelve counties in California, and comprises the great Vina ranch of 52,000 acres. A third deed conveys to the university Mrs. Stanford's home on the summit of Nob Hill, one of the most finely decorated houses in San Francisco, which, with the large lot, is worth $400,000. This will eventually be converted into an art gallery and museum. Despite this big donation, Mrs. Stanford has retained property worth several millions, so that she will be able to provide for other charities in which she is interested.

This splendid gift places the University in the ties in which she is interested.

This splendid gift places the University in the highest financial rank among the great universities of the world, and will enable it to carry out many projected plans. With the University of California, it ranks in efficiency and scope with Michigan, Chicago, Pennsylvania and Cornell universities, and possibly exceeds any of them in financial backing. Since the University first opened its doors, October 1, 1891, it has received about 4000 matriculated students from all parts of the world and has conferred degrees upon 1200. Instruction is free to all.

Mr. Carnegie's gift is different in character from that of Mrs. Stanford, inasmuch as it contemplates benefiting all the higher institutions of learning in this country. The sum of $10,000,000 and perhaps more will be given by Mr. Carnegie to carry out the project he has in mind. He will not endow a university, nor will he erect a number of monumental buildings, provided with laboratories and other adjuncts of such institutions. He will merely provide a fund of $10,000,000 to enable advanced students and scientific men to pursue their investigations at various educational centres either in America or in Europe. investigations at various educeither in America or in Europe.

not expected that any regularly constituted faculty of instructors will be provided, for the nature of the work to be carried on is to be of the most advanced kind. It is probable that the Washington Memorial Institution will suspend its operations, for it is said that Mr. Carnegie's plan not only embraces all the proposed activities of this institution but goes far beyond them.

These notable donations to the cause of a higher education place the donors in a most enviable position among the great givers of America, and their names will go down to posterity to be praised and glorified for all future time.

BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

T is early to predict what will be the best feature of 1902 bicycles, but it is a good time to consider the subject of bicycling attire. Like the proper adjustment of wheels, the failure to adopt proper clothing for cycling often makes riding a hardship. The men are very nearly as capricious as the women in selecting attire for outings. Some of the cycling costumes of both classes are as alarming as they are startling. Women attired in heavy boots, longish, cumbersome skirts and ungainly-looking head-gear are very frequently seen riding bicycles. For real comfort, wheelwomen want only the most essential and the lightest garments. The low-cut boot is the most desirable. It gives freedom of action and allows for coolness. Skirts should not be of heavy material, and they should not reach below the ankle. The most desirable hat for cycling is the straw sailor or the ordinary sized felt golf hat.

Men in order to wear suitable attire may be instructed to foreswear the ungainly, warm and homely-looking sweaters, which they seem partial to even in midsummer. The heavy bicycle hose should be avoided; in fact, the easy-fitting bloomer costume common with golf-players makes the most desirable bicycle outfit. In the warm weather riders express surprise that bicycling is so heating. They seem to overlook entirely the fact that in midsummer they cling to costumes that would be comfortable in mid-winter. With women particularly, for riding, suitable apparel plays a very important part. When riding in cool weather woolen garments next to the skin are necessary to prevent a cold that might develop into something more serious. In warm weather cotton underwear may be worn, though wool in the shape of a light jersey is preferred from a hygienic standpoint. The bicycle should always be kept well cleaned, the bearings properly set—a little loose rather than tight—the chain properly adjusted and in perfect running order. In the case of chain wheels an occasional bath of the chain in lubricating oil after it has been washed in kerosene oil to remove the dirt and grit is a necessity. Before the chain is put back on the wheel rub it as dry as possible, as the oil is needed in the bearings only; then before using the wheels spin the rear wheel round so that the oil will work into the bearings of the chain. In riding a bicycle the handlebars should be sufficiently low to support, when desired, the the body from the shoulders through the extended arms. A slight inclination of the body forward is preferable to a perfectly upright posture, but extremes in either direction are to be avoided. The perineum can be spared if some of the weight of the body is carried on the pedals. Again, both men and women have a tendency in riding to assume positions upon the wheel which are unhealthful. It often occurs that these complaints give rise to the idea that these companies give rise to the idea that certain persons are not fitted for cycling or that the exercise is too severe. But it is pretty well established that such complaints arise from improperly adjust-ed wheels, which are both uncomfortable and unhealthful.

The chainless bicycle requires little especial care to keep the running parts in perfect condition, so admirably devised are the lubricating arrangements for the gears and inner bearings.

Keep the tires well inflated and be sure that all nuts and bolts are set up tight. Nickel parts of the wheel should be cleaned and dried after a ride in the rain.

A factor essential to perfectly healthy results from bicycling is the bath after the ride; this the law of health and cleanliness demands. The danger of colds, chills and tired, headachey feeling many women experience after exercise is too severe. But it is pretty well established that severe. All riders, and more particularly new ones, should solicit the advice of experienced wheelmen in the adjustment of their wheels.

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: Just now we hear on every side the words
-"A happy new year to you!" "I wish you a happy new year!" What do these words mean? What is the thought of our friends in expressing the wish? Do they desire for us wealth, or pleasure, or freedom from care and toil? or do they wish for us contentment with our lot and a habit of seeing the bright side of life? a firm resolve to make the very best of what we have and to remember always that "Life, my dear, is what we make it,

And the world is as we take it."
The latter is the kind of a "happy new year" that Aunt Minerva wishes for each one of you, and her earnest hope is that every one of her nieces and nephews will find it day by day as the year goes on.
Our first letter this month is a bit of last summer's pleasant experiences.

Our first letter this month is a bit of last summer's pleasant experiences.

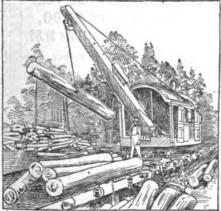

"An interesting trip was taken last summer to one of the logging camps in the Adirondacks. The camp was situated a few miles from Tupper Lake in one of the prettiest and wildest regions of the mountains. To reach it from the hotel where we were staying a trip of seven miles down the winding Requette River had to be taken, in one of the siender, easily-tipping guide boats, in which one has to be so careful to 'step on the ribs,' for fear of breaking through the thin, quarter inch flooring. The river was bordered on both sides by lovely woods, now a stretch of primeval forest with huge maples and beeches, and now a great burned-over area covered with half-grown white birches and quaking aspens, with great bare, pine trunks towering far above them, pathetic remnants of the old forest. A big blue heron rose now and then from the bank and lazily flapped his way across the stream. It was so still that we expected at any mo ment to see a deer come down to the water's edge and look at us with his gentle eyes, and indeed, in the soft mud along the shore, were many fres hly made tracks.

"Finally, a turn in the river brought us to the boat house, where we landed, and after a few minutes' walk reached the little settlement of lumbermen's huts. It was a picturesque sight, the log cabins in straight rows, with brightly-colored garments on the lines about them, and in one dark doorway a noid, long-bearded lumberman, looking, in the heavy shadow, not unlike a Rembrandt portrait.

"Passing the houses, we came at once to the logging railroad and soon saw a train of flat cars and

"Passing the houses, we came at once to the logging railroad and soon saw a train of flat cars and the log-loader. On both sides were huge piles of logs laid in rows, one on top of another, on the 'skidways.' These latter are not 'ways,' as the name suggests, but four logs placed in the form of a square, with ends crossing at the corners. The logs here were cut many miles further back in the woods in the winter and dragged here by horses, to await transportation on the logging railroad to Tupper Lake, where they were to be made into barrel staves. But the most interesting part of the scene was the log-loader. It held our attention with cort of fascination, it seemed so human. A gigan arm equipped with a pair of mammoth pincers. Eretched out of the window of a little red engine house on one of the cars. With much puffing and blowing a circled outward and downward, and seizing in its iron grasp a twelve foot log, slowly lifted it and bore it to the car, where it dropped it, apparently at just the place intended. Three men stood on the car, one to unfasten the iron talons from the log after it was settled, the other two to take and record the measurements. Still another stood below among the logs to guide the great pincers. When one car was filled, the arm swung idly while the engineer put on steam and ran the house itself, which was on a small track, to the next car. Then the arm began its work again and continued steadily until the next car was full.

"The day was rendered even more interesting by dinner at a camp a few miles further up the river. We went into the big bare dining-room after the lumbermen had left, and, sitting on long board benches at a table covered with oilcloth, ate with much relish their hearty fare of salt meat, baked beans, pie and coffee, served by a French Canadian cook. When dinner was over, we were taken upstairs to see the men's sleeping apartments, occupied in the winter by from sixty to a hundred men. One large room comprising the whole upper floor, was used for this purpose, and contained long parallel rows of bunks crowded closely together. It was difficult to imagine a hundred men there at one time.

"When we started back the sun was low in the compared to this sightly city, found the glorious and gorgeous sunsets one of the features of the place, but at the approach of twilight of this particular day the heavens con-

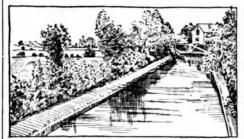

It was difficult to imagine a number of the cone time.

"When we started back the sun was low in the west and we watched the changing colors in the sky and on the shores as we rowed up the river, and noted the gradual re-appearance of familiar outlines; Seward, with its spreading, irregular form which changed with each bend in the river; Marcy, far-off, and blue in the distance; and finally Stony Brook and forest-covered Moose."

ALICE PIERSON, New York.

I have always wanted to see a real Indian village but the next best thing to seeing is to read the fol-lowing vivid pen picture of such a village and people.

"Away up in the foot hills of the San Jacinto mountains there is a little Indian settlement where a rude people still cling to their ancient customs and primitive methods. At the base of twin peaks of perfect similarity in form and size is a little village. One narrow street, and on either side a row of adobe houses. The walls are thick, the roofs of cat-tails and rushes, and the floors of hard packed earth. There are many quaint and picturesque scenes. They cut their grain by hand, beat it with flails or trample it out with ponies, and grind it in stone mortars.

"The Indian women are always at work, the men gamble or lie in the shade and smoke. On a barren hillside above the village stands a little white-washed adobe church, and every Sunday morning a brilliantly attired procession winds slowly up the hill in the hazy sunshine. At the door they dip their fingers in the holy water, kneel and cross themselves. When they are seated the priest lights the candles and kneeling before the altarraises his voice in a singing chant while the compared to the responds with gutteral intonations almost weird in effect. They pray, the priest talks awhile in their barbarous dialect, they are dismissed and go, wetting their fingers in the holy waters, back to their huts—to gamble the rest of the day and all the night among themselves and with the cowboys of the Rancho Diablo.

"Hot springs,now but little known but doubtless destined to become famous, are a source of revenue to these Indians. The springs are three in number and are separately characterized by sulphur, magnesia and iron. The water is clear as crysteal in the rocky basins, and from numerous crevices in the bottoms bubbles of gas are continually escaping, while the air fairly reeks with the natural fumes.

"The temperature of the water is about 144 degrees. It is conveyed in flumes of hollow logs to rude bath houses near by for the few white people who make it a yearly resort, renting cottages and taking the baths for many different maladies.

"From a near by peak a wonderful view may be had. On the north are the tangled ranges of the San Jacinto mountains, on the east the Colorado desert seems spread out at your feet, a vast stretch of barren sand with the mountains that mark its eastern borders f we have had several tetters of the of the official of the central states, but this one contains much that is interesting, so I may safely offer it for your reading.

"Will not the cousins and Aunt Minerva come and visit an old cousin far away down in the oil fields of Washington county, Ohio. Along this sluggish little Muskingum river the fields, though narrow, are very fertile and the hills rise above the little stream more than a thousand feet. Some of them, indeed, are almost mountains and are very beautifully formed. One of them, which I can see as I write, is very high, slightly separated from any other, and is of a perfect cone shape. So beautiful is this grassy cone that I often wonder if it was the work of nature or of that pre-historic race, the mound builders. It is known among us as Mount Olive. Far away across the valley is another hill which is very much higher than the rest, and from its top may be seen miles and miles of the great oil field. On the top of this hill is an oil well which has produced more than a hundred thousand barrels of oil and is still a small producer.

"When one sees from the top of this hill the many tall derricks which dot the hills and valleys, one can realize what a great industry the development of the oil product is and what a benefit it has been to the United States. This field is now on the decline, but there is a vast amount of undeveloped territory here yet and many rich strikes may still be made by the risky speculator. The work is very expensive, and it requires a fortune to develop a deep-sand field. If one is so unfortunate as to drill a few dry holes, discouragement and often a lack of money causes an abandonment of what is really good territory; but some later comer, possessing more means or proving more fortunate in his drills, may make a fortune on this same territory which yielded nothing to the first worker.

"One who has never visited an oil field cannot imagine what a grand thing the natural gas is. I often wonder as I light my gas fire to prepare a meal

The following letter comes from one of our most valued cousins and contributors, and treats of a very strange occurrence. I wonder if there are oth-ers of the cousins who witnessed this display of tained no touch of color. Suddenly with the setting of the sun, a light breeze sprung up which carried the clouds far southward and a flood of light illumined the summit of the mountain, and the great flag now stood revealed in wondrous color. All the brilliancy usually aflame at this hour in the west seemed to have forsaken the sky and enveloped the flag which, as though touched by fire, burned and glowed in the warm light. Evidently some remarkable act of nature was being carried out and all the inhabitants of the city, awed and mystified, stood beholding it far into the evening. As suddenly as it had come the remarkable color died away, leaving the mountain summit wrapped in its usual sombre stillness, but the city at its base was astir almost all night.

"Strong believers in omens stood firm in their belief that this glorification of the country's flag augered well for the future of the country, and it was not long after this, when the Union was at last secure, that the flag was again illumined and the old cannon at its feet fired in honor of the occasion." MAUD B. RODGERS, San Francisco, Cala.

Here is an interesting letter on historic old

Here is an interesting letter on historic old Yorktown and her monument. I wish Mrs. Early had told us a little more of the old place, of the house in which Washington had his headquarters and where the articles of capitulation were signed. It is still standing, and in constant use as a dwel-ling, but the room rendered famous by Washington's use is open to visitors. The old church, set in the midst of the graveyard, and the quaint little old houses, many of them dating back to Washington's time, are well worth a visit. Indeed.the whole place looks as if time had stood still there since the Revolution, and one could almost imagine one's self back in colonial times, so little has the place changed in appearance.

so little has the place changed in appearance.

"Yorktown, Virgivia, though a small place and almost untouched by the current of modern progress, as still a very interesting spot, for here occurred the culminating scene of the great drama of the American Revolution, namely, the surrender of Cornwallis, on October 19th, 1781. A part from historical associations, it also has a charm of its own from its location, being situated on one of the most on one of the most on the peninsula in Eastern Virginia formed by the York and James rivers, and is about twelve miles from Williamsburg, the old colonial capital of the state. All this section of Virginia formed by the York and James rivers, and is about twelve miles from Williamsburg, the old colonial capital of the state. All this section of Virginia formed by the York and James rivers, and is about twelve miles from Williamsburg, the old colonial capital of the state. All this section of Virginia is rich in historical associations, in addition to its natural beauties. A little more than twenty years ago a lofty monument was erected at Yorktown in commemoration of Cornwallis' surrender, and it was unvelled and inaugurated with appropriate ceremonies on the 19th of October, 1881, just a century from the day when Cornwallis, seeing himself penned in both by land and water, was compelled to capitulate. By orders from Sir Henry Clinton he had marched to Yorktown and taken up his quarters there—Lafayette who was close at hand speedily informed Washington of this move, and the latter, seeing the great advantages he might reap from it, marched as rapidly as possible from the Hudson to the Virginia peninsula with his combined French and American troops. He joined Lafayette about the last of September and laid siege to Yorktown by land, whilst by water it was besieged by a French fleet under Count De Grasse, a fleet consisting of twenty-five ships, containing three thousand troops. Surrounded thus both on land and water, there was no resource but for Cornwallis to surrender.

THE HEARTHSTONE 52 Duane St., New York

A Happy New Year to you all and a glad "How d' y' do?" to 1902. I suppose we shouldn't be glad to welcome the flight of time, but why not? It will go just as fast whether we are glad about it or sorry, so then let us be glad, for it will make it pleasanter in passing. I hope you will all have a year of good works and good rewards; and now let us take up our talk.

The first cousin to be answered in the new year is Sweet Rose of Butte, Montana, and she wants to know whether she should marry the young man her father has chosen for her, or the one she really loves. As she is but fifteen my advice is to marry neither for at least five years.

Josie, Plymouth, Cal.—I believe an engaged cou-ple may kiss each other at meeting and at parting even though "he comes six times a week." (2) Dark hair with gray or hazel eyes is brunette. "Chataine" I believe it is in French.

Polly Wog, Elliott, Ills.—You may correct a person before others if it is all well understood, otherwise it is better not. Eye glasses may be taken off and cleaned in the presence of company. Don't appear at the front door with your sleeves rolled up and your work apron on, unless you know who is there.

Pine Ridge Flower, Upton, Wyo.—Lemon juice is about the best and simplest remedy for freckles. (2) Engaged girls usually go to dances with their fiance when they live in the same neighborhood.

L. C. M. J., Washougal, Wash.—When you say you will not speak to the young man, keep your word. That will teach him you have strength of character. (2) As to the other simply ignore him.

character. (2) As to the other simply ignore him.

Bell and Jean, Peacham, Vt.—The middle aged man may sit by girls of sixteen. Girls of seventeen should not be waving their hands from windows at their "gentlemen friends". It is not wrong, but it is rather too familiar. Those things are largely governed by circumstances, however.

Ignorama, Hampton, Ia.—There is no form of congratulating people on their marriage or at other times. Use your own sense of what to say. (2) Your mother's cousin is your cousin, once removed. (3) Don't be too cautious. Marry the young man. (4) An engagement lasts. (5) Don't give up school teaching for stenography. (6) Twenty-two is better than twenty, and twenty-five is better than twenty-two, as a marrying age.

Effie and Ellinor, Big Run, Pa.—Invite the caller as a marrying age.

Effice and Ellinor, Big Run, Pa.—Invite the caller in if it is not too late. (2) Part with your dear friend as you would with your brother, except the kiss. (3) Friends of long standing call each other by their first names. (4) Keep your hands out of the overcoat pockets. (5) You may write to more than one man if you are very good friends. (6) There is no cure for jealousy. (7) If no time is set for the caller to come, you might wait half an hour; five minutes is enough otherwise. (8) The one most at fault should be first to apologize. If the fault is equal the man should be first, as an act of gallantry, not as a matter of right.

J. J. C., Jefferson City, Mo.—Ask one of your local

J. J. C., Jefferson City, Mo.—Ask one of your local physicians for the address of the City Physician, St. Louis, and write a personal letter to him for the information you want, inclosing postage for reply. Charlotte, Galena, Ills.—Very sorry, my dear, but your letter came too late to be answered for Christmas.

Susan, Altoona, Pa.—I believe driving after dark is permissible in the country. It is not in the city. (2) Yes. (3) Send him home at ten-thirty. (4) Presents and pictures may be exchanged between boys and girls to a limited extent.

X. Y. Z., New York.—Ask your druggist about celandine.

Lillian, Denver, Col.—Make your response to the toast to suit your own self; there is no rule. (2) The lady usually suggests going home when out with an escort. (3) Usually the lady waits for the man to ask her to go to an entertainment, unless she has tickets or invitations.

Miss I. R. A., Glenwood, N. Y. — You cannot make your eyes large and beautiful or your lips gracefully curving, unless nature does it for you. Dermatologists can improve them somewhat. I think the other equally difficult by artificial means.

Sunflower, Hagerstown, Md.—A gentleman would not do what you say this man has done, and you should cut him off the list of your friends.

Cousin Emory, McKinney, Texas. No, if the girl does not love the young man, his asking her to marry him will not make her love him, and will only humiliate him.

Lillian and Anna, Williamsville, Ills.—There was nothing to say to the young man except good night. (2) Ask them to call again.

Glen, Akron, Ohio.—Wait till you are twenty and he is twenty-five, then you may go with him.

Poppy, Edenvale, Cal.—I suppose it would be quite proper to congratulate the groom by letter though you do not know the bride. (2) Wedding presents should be acknowledged by notes to donors. (3) Letters of congratulation need not be answered. (4) No. (5) Eighteen is rather young for "keeping company" with young men, though many women are wives before they are eighteen.

Mayflower, Blanche, Ala.—The man waits for the Mayflower, Blanche, Ala.—The man waits for the lady to extend her hand to shake. (2) Better not marry the young man who promises to stop drinking if you will marry him. Why doesn't he stop Richards, Mobile, Ala.—Forget the young man. He does not love you.

H. G. S. Runge, Texas. Waituntil you are older, before letting these things bother you.

N. W., Rockport, Ind. I cannot give subjects for graduating essays. Surely your years in school have taught you what best to choose to write about.

Pansy, Hiattsville, Ia.—Keep on reading and holding to your common sense views of life. You will come out all right after a while.

J. O. E., Beulah, Ohio.—Have a talk with the young men and if they confirm your suspicions, drop them. (2) No one has a right to say you shall not go to church. That is a matter between yourself and your conscience.

Jennie, Elmwood, Ind.—Refreshments would be in order for a caller from a distance. (2) Let the in order for a caller from a distance. (2) Let the young man put on his own overcoat. (3) It is the custom in less formal society to accompany a caller to the front door, but it need not be done.

him. Now you must suffer for it.

Propounder, Austin, Texas.—An eighteen year old girl should wear her skirt full length. (2) No. (3) The rejection of a manuscript is no sign that the writer is lacking in ability. The next editor may think it first class. (4) In my opinion, and I speak for myself alone, your verses are lacking in strength, and are not metrical throughout.

There, my dears, all your questions are answered, and I am leaving you now for a month, with the very best wishes, and the hope that I have done some good by my advice, as I know you have done me good by asking it of me. May the first month of the new year be joyous to you all. By by.

CONDITIONS.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living paimists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to Comport Palmistry Club. Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank

tor rendings unle-s the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to more the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixetly, which can be hought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an alomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plusiver cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

EVERAL inquiries have come with regard to the "Croix Mystique." This is a sign so entirely by itself that I devote a separate discussion to it. It is found traced with more or less distinction in the quadrangle beneath the finger of Saturn.

It always gives to a subject mysticism, super-stition and occultism, or, with a very good hand, religion. If it is very large it betrays exaggerated superstition, bigotry and hallu-nation.

If it is clearly traced in both hands, it betravs folly arising from the excessive influence crays folly arising from the excessive influence of the principal mount; thus, with Jupiter developed, over-ambition; with Saturn, misanthropy; with Apollo, extreme vanity or miserliness; and with Venus, erotomanie.

If the "Croix Mystique" is joined to the line of Saturn, it foretells good fortune arising from religion.

of Saturn, it foretells good fortune arising from religion.

If it is displaced so as to lie, as it were, between the Mounts of Mars and of the Moon, it indicates a changeability of disposition which will lead to good fortune.

"M. Truthful" has a line crossing the fate line or line of Saturn, which would be read by some as a "Croix Mystique," although I should not so interpret it myself. This is a hand, however, that is liable to bring good fortune as it has several lucky signs besides. The life line after the age of twenty, is singularly free from opposition of any kind. Previous to that age I should judge that this person was hampered in many ways and not allowed to have his own way in many things, but after that he is free to lead his own life and to go his own way. His right hand is much better than his left. The latter indicates a selfish person who would sacrifice almost anything to gain his own ends. At the same time his right hand would indicate that he has overcome these tendencies of his nature and he is an upright and moral man upon whom the community at large may safely depend. He will live to be eighty or more, and his life will be uncommonly smooth and free from troubles after the age of twenty-five. His depend. He will live to be eighty or more, and his life will be uncommonly smooth and free from troubles after the age of twenty-five. His health will be good, although I should say there is some underlying weakness of the constitution not apparent to the casual observer. He will be a good business man and will make a good deal of money after the age of thirty-five. In matters of the heart he will be straightforward and honorable, and the woman who unites her fortunes to his will be well cared for and kindly treated and appreciated. At unites her fortunes to his will be well cared for and kindly treated and appreciated. At the age of twenty he has had or will have some peculiar experience over which he has worried a good deal, but it will not affect his future life for on the whole he will have a very successful and prosperous, although uneventful, career.

Somebody has asked what the principal signs of a murderous hand are. First, you will find the color to be color to be very red or even livid. If the former, the mur-der will be done in a momentary fit of anger; if the latter it is liable to be more deeply planned and carefully brooded over and the whole nature of this subject is evil. This, how-ever, should not be taken as an indication infal-lible, because oflible, because often a highly colored hand is the sign of good health; only this must be otherwise well marked. The first phalanx of the finger of Mercury will be heavily lined, and at the base of the line of life will (probably) be found a sister line. The line of head will be deeply traced and thick, having probably a circle upon it, and being generally joined to the line of heart and separate from the line of life. The nails short, the line of life thick at the commencement, and spotted with red, and the line of head twisted across the hand. All these signs collected in a land are an infallible indication of a murderous instinct.

Take another example: In this hand we find the line of head twisted and very red, a grille is placed upon the Mount of Mercury, and the whole hand is dry and thin, having the joints developed on the fingers. From the third phalanx of the little finger sundry small lines go on to the mount, which latter is also scarred with a deep strong ray. This is the hand of a thief, and the impulse of theft will be found to be almost, (if not quite) insurmountable.

hand of a thief, and the impulse of theft will be found to be almost, (if not quite) insurmountable.

Falsehood,—i. e. a general tendency to deceit—is always very clearly marked in the hand and is marked by a number of different signs, any one of which by itself is a sufficient indication of a strong tendency in that direction. These are: a high Mount of the Moon, upon which the line of head is forked, and on which are found small red points; the thumb is short and on the inner surfaces of the phalanxes of the fingers there appears a kind of hollowing or sinking in of the flesh. The line of head is generally separated from that of life by a space which is filled with a number of confused lines.

Another very characteristic hand is the voluptuous or pleasure-loving hand. The fingers are smooth and pointed, having the third or lower phalanges swollen; the whole hand is plump and white, the palm strong, and the thumb short, giving it sensitiveness. The Mount of Venus is high. Such subjects are impressionable, and liable to fall into grave errors; they are sensual, vain, and egotists, always actuated by motives of pleasure. Women who have these hands are always dangerous, for they are subtle and unscrupulous in their pursuit of enjoyment, and often exercise a most fatal influence upon men into whose lives they come.

An artist will have, of course, the typical most fatal influence upon men into whose lives they come.

An artist will have, of course, the typical artist hand, but there are differences which denote the different taste of the artist, as for instance, the flower painter will have the Mount of Venus high with long fingers, and a large thumb; (color, detail, and perseverance); the painter of still life will have rather squared fingers and the Mount of Mercury; (exactitude and science); the painter of battle pieces will have the Mount of Mars developed, indicating the natural taste would of Mars developed, indicating the natural taste of the subject. Painters with squared fingers always paint what always paint what they can actually see rather than what they merely imagine.

In a doctor's hand we shall find the Mount of Mercury rayed with the line of Apollo clearly traced. The doctor whose hands bear the Mount of the Moon well developed will always be inclined to discoveries and eclecticism, and the doctor with hard hands and very much spatulated fingers will have a patural percentage.

ARTISTIC HAND.

ly traced. The doctor whose hands bear the Mount of the Moon well developed will always be inclined to discoveries and eclecticism, and the doctor with hard hands and very much spatulated fingers will have a natural penchant for veterinary surgery.

The astronomer has the Mount of the Moon, of Mercury, and of Saturn well developed, with long knotty fingers to add calculation to his imagination and science.

The horticulturist has a hand in which we find the Mounts of Venus and the Moon high, with spatulate fingers to give him energy, and long fingers to give him detail.

Square fingers with a good line of Apollo and a good line of Jupiter, denote an architect.

Sculpture betrays itself by a scarcity of lines, the Mounts of Venus, of Mars, and of the Moon high in the hand, which has a strong tendency to thickness and hardness.

Literary men have always the Mounts of Jupiter and of the Moon developed; the latter particularly, if the taste lies in the line of poetry. Literature gives, as a rule, soft spatulate or square hands, with the joints (especially that of matter, the second), slightly developed. Literary critics have always short nails and high Mounts of Mercury.

Among musicians subjects whose fingers are spatulate, and whose Mounts of Saturn are high, whose nails are short and whose joints are developed, with the Mount of the Moon prominent, long thumbs, the Line of Apollo, and (as a rule) the Girdle of Venus. Melody generally gives smooth fingers with mixed tips, the prevailing Mount being Venus.

The actor has fingers which are either spatuaturns up slightly towards the Mount of Mercury, and as a rule, a line runs from the Mount of Mars to that of Apollo.

The Preservation of Timber.

OHN Branch of North Carolina was secretary of the navy department in 1829. In his official report for that year he recommended a method of treatment of timber used in the American navy for the purpose of preservation which the lapse of time has demonstrated to be of immense value.

mense value.

Live oak, he said, should be immersed for twelve months in water, then taken up and placed under cover to protect it against sun, rain and high winds. Its immersion rendered it less liable to split. White oak, he said, should be soaked about eighteen months in fresh or two years in salt water; then taken up fresh, or two years in salt water; then taken up and sawed into such sizes as may be required, and then placed under cover for about two or three years. Yellow pine should be docked about twelve months; then taken up, sawed and covered for about two years. Mast timber should be immersed and covered in mud till wanted for use.

An excellent illustration of well preserved oak timber is found in the United States Government bonded warehouse adjoining the old Lazaretto grounds, at Essington, Penn. The warehouse was built over a hundred years ago, and the oak joists, which are about two feet thick, are as sound and strong to-day as they were when first put in place. The old building has been used for various purposes, and a few years ago it served as a refuge for about fifty Indian sailors from Calcutta, who were in quarantine there, while about a dozen of their number were being treated at the Lazaretto hospital for beri-beri, a rare disease in this country.

A Wide-Open Letter

Specially to that Great Army of Weak Men Who have been Hoodwinked and Defrauded by the Worse than Infamous Mountebanks Who Disgrace the Medicine Business.

Mr. Geo. S. Beck, Proprietor of "Wonder-Workers," the Greatest and Best Remedy for all Kinds of Sexual Weakness that the World Has Ever Known, Throws Another Bomb into the Camp of the Sharks Who Prey Upon the Fears of Weak Men, and Offers Their Victims the Benefit of His Great Remedy at Cost.

My Dear Brothers:—More than 250,000 permanent cures during the past three years prove that my "Wonder-Workers" are a Godsend to weak men everywhere. There is not a case of Lost Manhood, Night or Day Losses, Varicocele, Sexual Weakness or Nervous Troubles of any kind anywhere on earth (no matter whether caused by overwork, self-abuse or worry; and no matter whether the man be old or young) that "Wonder-Workers" will fail to cure quicker and at less expense than any other remedy made anywhere in the world if simply used (at home, at your work) one tablet at a dose three times a day. They cured me in less than one month's time, at the age of forty-four years, when I like you, lacked that vitality without which a person is a man only in name, and after I had been nearly ruined by the frauds and fakirs who disgrace the medicine business. I ask you to bear in mind that I am the only man in the world in the business who has solemnly sworn that the medicine he sells cured himself and that the names of all who buy it will be held sacred forever. MY DEAR BROTHERS:-More than 250,000 of all who buy it will be held sacred forever.

I am the same Geo. S. Beck, living at 420 South Market Street, Springfield, Ohio, who is hated by every Electric Belt impostor. Free Sample schemer, C. O. D. fraud, Free Prescription fakir, and Doctor by Mail humbug in America because of the manner in which I have exposed their infamous schemes. Their only object in making "Free" offers is to get the names of men who are sexually weak so that they may harass them with their impudent letters and lying, filthy circulars; and I, here and now, again challenge any and all of these frauds and poison distributers to thoroughly sift and test my charges of low villainy and palpable fraud in any court of law or justice they may select. If you have had any dealings with them you know that all my charges against them are true as Gospel.

I beg to assure you on my honor as a man that no matter whether you are married or single, old, young or middle aged; or no matter whether your weakness or nervousness is caused by over-work, secret vice or the excessive use of strong drink or tobacco, the use of my "Wonder-Worker" will search every nerve center of your body, renew every tissue, develop every organ, strengthen every muscle, invigorate every function, and bring to you a perfect and permanent restoration of strength and manly vigor. The reason why "Wonder-Workers" do this is because they are a Pure Nerve Food and Tonic, and because they are a Pure Nerve Food and Tonic, and because they are a Pure Nerve Food and Tonic, restoration of strength and manly vigor. The reason why "Wonder-Workers" do this is because they are a Pure Nerve Food and Tonic, and because they do not contain any phosphorus, or Spanish fly, or any other of the poisons that make the vile nostrums sent out by the frauds and quacks so dangerous to human life. It is perfectly safe to use them at any time or under any circumstances, and their use will not fail to restore natural strength and vigor without any trace of excitement or stimulation in old or young.

Because of the wonderful merit of my "Wonder-Workers," and the fact that I treat every man as fairly in every respect as though he was my own natural brother, I have built up the largest mail-order medicine business in the world in less than three years. I defy any man to whom I sent "Wonder-Workers" to say that I have treated him unfairly in any manner, shape or form. If you order "Wonder-Workers" mention this paper, the publisher of which is hereby authorized to publish me as a fraud and scoundrel if I fail to do exactly as I agree with any of its readers.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE heavenly speculum at the New Moon, which occurs at about 13 minutes past 8 o'clock in the morning of the 8th of February, 1902, shows the 15th degree of Pisces rising and the 21st degree of Sagittarius culminating. The Lunation falls in the 18th house are also found the planets Venus, Mercury, and Mars nearly conjoined: Herschel is on the South Meridian. Saturn is in the 11th house about 8 degrees ahead of Jupiter and Neptune is below the earth in the 4th house of the figure.

The astrological promises of the figure are in the main good. Jupiter, the great benefic, being ruler of the Ascendant and Midheaven, and hence ruler of the scheme, stands in the 11th house unaffected and Herschel on the Meridian casts favorable rays to the conjoined luminaries. There seems to be but little if anything to detract from the favorable indications for the nation's welfare and progress. Herschel so near the meridian is indicative of some unusual trials to the chief executive of the country, foreshadowing a degree of unpopularity or disfavor by reason of his personal eccentricities or originality and independence of his methods. Saturn in the 11th shows a rebellious and troublesome element in Congress opposing the efforts of the administration for the public good. Jupiter the ruler of the figure being also present in the house indicates that the administration will prevail and effect legislation that will greatly promote the welfare of the nation and our people. Mars in the 12th house, in the congress of planets, gives caution to the authorities to avoid the outbreak of an eruptive disease of serious character in some one of the great prisons of the country; there will be some insubordination among prisoners, attended with violence or some bad fire in such places unless great care is had by those in-charge.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR FEBRUARY, 1902.

FEBRUARY 1—Saturday. Use the early forenoon hours for buying or selling real estate or for having dealings with those engaged in the laborious occupations; but at the noon time keep the temper; avoid persons in authority; have no surgical operation performed, especially to the region of the groin or the throat, as high states of inflammation will be likely to ensue or the heart and circulation will be adversely affected; look out for sprains and hurts; give thy best attention to business in the afternoon, especially such as affects money transactions, when also make purchases for both use and profit.

2-Sunday. Indifferent and passive; a good day for complete rest.

complete rest.

3.—Monday. A fair day for the musical and artistic pursuits and all polite avocations, provided that no business pertaining to copyrights, patents or trademarks be done during the passing hours.

4.—Tuesday. Be up with the sun and employ every moment of the day; literary labors are performed with more facility than usual, especially such as pertain to the elegant in life; commercial transactions with mechanics and manufacturers should be urged; deal in cattle, metals, cutlery, chemicals, glassware and electrical machinery and apparatus, also all classes of musical and dramatic merchandise; social entertainments will be unusually agreeable during this day and execution will be remarkable in all artistic and decorative work.

6-Thursday. Avoid this time for doing business relating to buildings, architecture and agriculture; sign no leases, mortgages or deeds, and avoid aged persons; as the noon time is passing make beginnings in all transactions pertaining to banks and money matters generally; make collections and adjust accounts; also make purchases for trade in regularly established business.

8 — Naturday. A superior day, in which all affairs of life may be urged with good success; the time is peculiarly propitious for making commencements in all mechanical work of an artistic or decorative nature, especially if connected with public affairs or for government authorities; seek favor from public officials and have dealings with railways and other great corporate bodies; the time is excellent for executive work of all kinds and the artistic pursuits are favored in an eminent degree.

9—Sunday. Influences are adverse to best advancement of religious interests and church matters, though conducive to eloquent pulpit utterances and mental efforts; the day generally will be excitable and likely to provoke disputes and controversies, and it suggests patience and self-control.

10-Monday. Sign no money obligation on this day nor have any dealings with pawnbrokers or money-lenders of any class; shun transactions with public men and all representatives of corporate bodies; make bargains in the evening pertaining to houses or lands or their improvements.

11-Tucaday. Crowd all thine affairs to the utmost on this day; buy goods to sell again; deal with banks and other monied institutions; urge collections; seek money accommodations and press matters connected with charitable works and ecclesiastical affairs.

12—Wednesday. Defer matters of much importance in the artistic and literary pursuits; do not sign writings or make engagements or contracts pertaining to any manufacturing enterprise or the publication of polite literature.

13.—Thursday. Use the forenoon for all business relating to the fine arts and all musical and dramatical matters; look out for the pennies in the afternoon when little financial gain can be expected and when no purchases should be made either for use or trade; the latter part of the day is to be preferred for unusual mental efforts and for urging extensive correspondence, and solution of knotty mathematical problems.

14—Friday. The mind will be acute and imagination active at this time. Urge all general business; adjust accounts and crowd all literary and scientific pursuits; commercial matters are especially favored and contracts concerning the publication of surgical, mechanical and chemical works may be now successfully entered into; give preference to the afternoon for dealing with lumbermen, agriculturists, builders and real estate traders.

15—Saturday. Defer matters of much importance in the artistic and literary pursuits; do not sign writings or make engagements or contracts; this is a poor time to replenish the stock of artistic, fancy, or decorative goods or to make engagements in dramatic matters; seek favor or advantage from persons of means in the evening.

or advantage from persons of means in the evening.

16. Sunday, Beware of a too-ready tongue in the morning hours when disputes and mental hurts are likely. Pulpit utterances are likely to be voluble and aggressive rather than pacific or conciliatory; conditions are conducive to combustion and fires and explosions are likely during the night preceding this day.

17—Monday. Begin this day early and waste no moments in idleness; the time is specially favorable for the merchant and tradesman and for all engaged in the artistic or literary avocations; trade in wearing apparel and articles of decoration or adornment; urge correspondence, deal with mathematicians and scientists, publishers, printers, brokers, teachers, commercial travellers, tailors, milliners, musicians and theatrical 18—Tuesday. Do not relax thine efforts of yester-day, but urge general business to the utmost, giving preference to the forenoon for thine engagements with manufacturers, chemists and machinists, when also ex-periment in chemistry and urge avocations conducted by the use of fire and sharp tools; seek no favor at the hands of thine employer in the latter half of the day.

nands of thine employer in the latter half of the day.

19—Wednesday. An evil day, likely to be noted for fires, excitement and sudden accidents; the criminal classes are excited to special activity and human passions will need to be well controlled for avoidance of very evil consequences; be sure not to make any engagement with builders or contractors for excavations; keep out of dangerous places underground, and do not make any bargains for houses or lands or any class of mining properties.

20—Thursday. Do not be led into extravagant ex-penditures nor make any investment of thy means for speculative purposes and see that losses do not come to thee through thine own carelessness.

21—Friday. The early morning is the best part of the day; do not purchase any articles of an artistic or decorative nature, or any wearing apparel in the forenoon or noon hours; avoid transacting business with publishers, lawyers, churchmen and all engaged in educational ventures, in the afternoon and evening.

22—Saturday. Give no cause for offense to thine employer nor seek any promotion on this day; beware of vicious animals and be very careful in handling fire-arms and chemicals; bad fires are likely, involving large money losses in the next twenty-four hours; keep out of all kinds of disputes and controversies.

23 Sunday. Thy pastor's discourse is likely to contain many peculiar sentiments and many radical and original ideas and the oddities and curiosities of life engage the thoughts; the aged are pleasantly disposed in the evening.

24—Monday. Press thy most important engagements in trade during the middle hours of the day; when also deal with the banker and persons of wealth and prominence; solicit money accommodations and buy goods for trade except the artistic and decorative in character; the musical and social entertainments of the evening will not prove satisfactory.

25—Tuesday. Favorable for courtship, marriage, pleasure-seeking, house-furnishing and for all matters connected with the fine arts; also for the beginning of undertakings connected with books and publications; make written applications to public officers and superintendents in corporate bodies for favor or advantages.

26—Wednesday. Disappointment is likely to attend thy footsteps during the forenoon of this day, when thou shouldst not seek any advantage from dealings with builders, contractors, real estate men or any persons engaged in the dirty or laborious avocations.

27—Thursday. Pecuniary losses are among the effects induced by the prevailing conditions of this day; so be thou careful that thy purchases are prompted by necessity rather than for profit or self-gratification; beware of signing thy name to any written obligation to pay money; ask favors of thine employer in the afternoon.

28—Friday. Baffling circumstances attend the prosecution of regular business relating to fancy and ornamental goods, musical merchandise and also the pursuit of the fine arts; beware of making any matrimonial engagement at this time nor expect much enjoyment from the pursuit of pleasure or amusements.

NOTICE TO AGENTS

A Profitable Business

FOR MEN AND WOMEN WHO ARE

WILLING WORK. TO $3.00 A DAY SURE.

DEAR READER:

If you are out of work, or are not satisfied with your present business and would like to make more money, it will be to your interest to read this notice. We do not offer you a chance to make a fortune without work, but we do offer you an opportunity to make money much faster than you can make it at any other kind of work. The country is flooded with circulars offering chances to make money at the rate of from twenty to fifty dollars a day; such offers are not business-like, and all agents who amount to anything are disgusted with such circulars, and most of them are thrown aside without being read. If you are looking for an opportunity to make twenty to fifty dollars a day, you might as well throw this notice aside also; but if you would like to engage in a good paying business, you will do well to read this notice through carefully. Then you can use your own judgment as to whether our offer is a reasonable one or not.

We guarantee that anyone who is willing to work can make from $3 to $5 a day at this business. We admit that $3 to $5 a day is not much of an inducement when compared to the statements made by some firms, who offer all the way from $20 to $50 a day for selling various articles. We do not make you such glowing promises, but what we do offer you has the advantage of being true. We might offer agents a sure chance of making from $20 to $50 a day, but the chances are that anyone who would believe such unreasonable nonsense would not know -enough to earn his board at any kind of business. That is not the kind of agents we are in quest of; we want reliable agents with common sense, who are willing to work for good pay, and not those who are looking for an opportunity to make a fortune without work. We believe the only way to get such agents and keep them, is to furnish them with a good thing to sell, a real genuine bargain, and then to tell them the exact truth about genuine bargain, and then to tell them the exact truth about the business. We have a large number of agents at work, and we know for a certainty what working agents can make. We know that $3 a day is the very lowest; most of our agents are averaging $4 and $5 a day, and often some of them make a good deal more than that. We have several agents who are clearing from $7 to $10 a day. But these are great workers operating in the best territory, and, of course, everyone cannot do as well, but it is easy for anyone to make, at the very least, $3 a day above all expenses 1; any territory. We haven't a single working agent who is clearing, on an average, less than $3 a day. Now, be sure that you understand us: We don't say that lazy, shiftless agents will make $3 a day, for they can't do it at this or any other business, but what we do say is that agents who are willing to work, not too hard, but the same as they would expect to work at any other business, can easily clear $3 a day above all expenses, in any territory, and if they have good territory to work in they can make anywhere from $5 to $7, and even $10 a day. If you want a good chance to work and get good pay for it, you will find it to your interest to read this notice through carefully.

The articles which we have for you to sell are a line of forks, spoons, etc., made of a new metal called "Brazil Silver." We will describe this new line of goods the best we can, then you can judge for yourself whether we are offering you a good chance to make money or not. the business. We have a large number of agents at work, and

BRAZIL SILVER.

Warranted for Twenty-five Years.

Brazil Silver is believed to be the very best metal in existence for the manufacture of forks and spoons; it has all the lustre and brilliancy of burnished coin silver, and is much harder and more durable, in fact, it is impossible to wear it out. It is absolutely indestructible. The goods made of this metal are the same all the way through, there being no plating to wear off they will remain as good as new for any length of time. For all practical purposes in the manufacture of table ware this Brazil Silver is superior to coin silver. It is as lustrous and as pure as coin silver, and being much harder it will wear even longer than silver; in fact it is absolutely impossible to wear it out. It will wear forever. As there is no plating to wear off, the metal being the same all the way through, it stands to reason that you can't wear it out. Our confidence in the metal is so great that we guarantee it to wear twenty-five years. We give a guarantee signed by the company warranting the goods to wear and to give perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years. We are an old, strong and thoroughly established firm with ample capital to carry on our business and make our guaranty as good as the Bank of England. In selling these goods an agent can recommend them with the greatest of confidence, for they are just as represented, absolutely indestructible. And, furthermore, our guarantee warranting the goods to give satisfaction for twenty-five years, clears the agent from all responsibility in the matter; for if any article fails to give perfect satisfaction, no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready to refund the money paid for the article. These goods are the same metal all the way through; they will never wear out. They always wear white and bright. We give a guarantee signed by the company, warranting every piece of Brazil Silver to wear twenty-five years. You can sell these goods to your best friends with perfect confidence, for every sale is as much a benefit to your customer as to yourself.

Working with goods that are warranted to wear and give satisfaction for so long a time as twenty-five years, and by a Company, too, whose capital is sufficiently large to make their guarantee good for almost any amount, is an advantage which no other firm is prepared to offer. If you want to make money fast now is the time to do it. If you think that fivedollar bills are good things to have, now is the time to get them. Never in the history of the agency business have agents had as good a chance to make money rapidly, and it is reasonably sure that they will never have another chance like it.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

All Marked with Initial Letters, Without any Extra Cost.

Among all classes there has always been a strong desire to have their table ware marked with their initial letter, but on account of the heavy expense of having it marked only a very few have been able to afford it. Heretofore the cost of artistically marking table ware has been even greater than the cost of the goods; now, by our new methods, we are able to offer these elegant Brazil Silver goods, all marked with any initial letter desired in the very highest style of the art, without any extra cost for marking. These Brazil Silver goods, even if unmarked, would be the greatest bargain ever offered the public in table ware, but with the additional and highly desirable feature of being all marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, these goods are not only great bargains in table ware, but are the greatest bargains of any kind that have ever been offered to the public through agents or in any other way.

The people are always ready enough to buy what they want when it is presented to them in the form of a genuine bargain. Well, here is absolutely the greatest bargain every offered, and the agent who works with it will find that what he has is earnestly desired at nearly every house he visits; it is easy to get orders when you can offer great bargains, that the people really want and can afford.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

Table and Dessert Knives.

Our knives are made of the finest tempered cutlery steel and are triple plate, in other words every dozen knives is plated with 12 dwt. of pure silver and hand burnished. Our knives are of the highest grade, fully equal to Rogers' or any knives made. These knives will not wear as long as Brazil Silver goods, but they will wear as long as any knives made. We guarantee them to wear ten years in constant use. If not in constant use they will wear proportionately longer. We give a guarantee, signed by the Company, warranting the knives to wear and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser for ten years. As knives are usually used in families they will wear much longer, anywhere from fifteen to twenty years. They are fully equal to Rogers' knives and only cost about two-thirds as much. It may seem strange to some that we can sell so staple an article as silver plated knives at such reduced prices, but we are doing it. It is our way of giving the public good, solid value for their money. We are saving our customers about one-third of the price at which the same grade of knives are sold at the stores and jewelers. Any one who will take the trouble to compare our knives and prices with triple plate 12 dwt. knives sold at the stores and jewelers, will be convinced of the truth of our statements. We are making a profit, of course, but our unequal facilities and immense trade make it possible for us to undersell all competitors, and our customers are getting the benefit of the lowest prices known in the silverware trade. We are not only selling at greatly reduced prices, but we also guarantee every article to be exactly as represented and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser, or money refunded.

The First Thing to Do.

If you decide to accept the agency, the first thing to do is to send to us for the agent's case of samples, which is the most complete and perfect case of samples that has ever been prepared for the convenience of agents. Our complete and perfect case of samples is not to be compared with anything that has ever been sent to agents before. It contains the very best and most salable articles in the world. There is nothing in the mar-ket that agents can sell as fast and sell as easily and make as much money out of, as they can the goods contained in this as much money out of, as they can the goods contained in this splendid case of samples, and everything is arranged and explained so that any agent can't fail to understand just how to go to work to make a great success of the business. As soon as you receive the case of samples you are ready for business. And if you are willing to work you are just as sure to make from $3$ to $5$ a day as the sun is to rise. Take the case of samples and canvass your territory according to the directions sent with the samples, until you have taken orders for the amount of goods you are prepared to send for. Then order the goods from us and fill your orders, and so continue.

The Magnificent Case of Samples Which We Furnish to Agents.

The case of samples which we furnish to agents contains the following articles: One Sample Table Knife, retail price, $2.10 per set of six One Sample Dessert Knife, retail price, $1.95 per set of six 32 1-2 cents each One Sample Table Fork, retail price, $1.95 per set 32 1-2 cents each One Sample Table Spoon, retail price, $1.95 per set 32 1-2 cents each One Sample Dessert Fork, retail price, $1.80 per set of six cents each Pickle Cruets, Butter Dishes, Tea Sets, Napkin Rings, etc., etc., etc., etc.

Reckoning the above samples at our lowest retail prices they amount to $2.831-3. We furnish them to agents nicely put up in an elegant sample case or roll, for only $1.00, which is $1.83 1-3 less than they amount to at our reguler retail prices. This is less than one-half of the retail value of the samples, and much less than they cost us. The sample case or roll, which the samples are put up in costs us nearly as much as we require you to send for the samples, case and all.

Wholesale Prices.

Wholesale or agents' prices and all necessary information for carrying on the business will be furnished with the Outfit. Reeverything plain to you about wholesale prices, methods, etc., when we send you the Outfit.

VERY IMPORTANT.

The business we are offering is straightforward and honest in everyway, shape and manner. Our goods are in every respect, just as we represent them to be. The Outfit we furnish our agents is exactly as we represent it, and is always sent the same day the order is received, just as agreed. We have tried to state these facts so they could and would be believed and still we are constantly receiving letters from parties who would like to engage in the business and would do so if they felt sure we were telling the truth and would do as we agree. Many of these doubters have been cheated and are not altogether to blame for doubting; the most of them say they think we are honest, they say we talk honest, but as they have already been swindled they don't feel like risking even one dollar and so, although our business is in every respect just as represented, and we always do just as we promise, we lose the services of a great many agents and they lose the benefit they might derive from the business because they are afraid we may not be telling the truth. Now, to overcome this spirit of doubt, we have decided to send Samples to all who wish us to do so, C. O. D., with privilege of examination at the express office. It costs us from twenty-five to forty cents more to send the samples this way, as we have to pay that amount for return charges on the money, but we are willing to do it and so prove to all that are interested that the Outfit and our goods are just what we claim. If after reading this notice you think you would like to give the business a trial but wish to see the Sample Case be-fore you pay the one dollar cut out the following printed form, fill it out and send it to us and we will send the Outfit to your express office prepaid, and give the express agent instruc-tions to let you thoroughly examine the Outfit, then, if you are tions to let you thoroughly examine the Outfit, then, it you are satisfied that we have told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and are also satisfied that you can make money selling our goods, you can pay the express agent _ One dollar and take the Outfit. If you are not satisfied, you can refuse to take it and the agent will return it to us. No other firm has ever made such an offer. We have adopted this plan in order to convince the most skeptical and to secure the services of all the good working agents in the United States.

(CUT OUT THE FOLLOWING FORM.) Form to be Signed by those who wish us to send the Outfit C. O. D. with Privilege of Examination.

ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., DETROIT, MICH.:

GENTLEMEN—Send the Outfit by Express, C. O. D., with privilege of examination. If I find the Outfit just as you say, I will pay the one dollar required and give the business a fair trial, but if I am not satisfied that the Outfit is as good as you recommend it to be, I shall refuse to receive it. Now, remember, the understanding is that I am not to take the Outfit unless I, myself, am satisfied that it is all right. It must all depend on my own judgment. If I am satisfied, I will take the Outfit; if I am not satisfied, I shall not take it and shall not pay the one dollar If you want to send the Outfit with this understanding, send it along C. O. This cut shows the Sample Case or Roll, and how the samples appear put up ready for business. The Roll is made of highly appear put up ready for business. The Roll is made of highly finished waterproof canvas, and lined with soft fiannel goods. The samples are held in place by strong straps. The whole rolls up and fastens with a leather strap which is firmly fastened to the back of the Roll. This is the most practical arrangement for carrying the samples that could be thought of. When rolled up the Case is compact and easy to carry. When open the samples show to the best possible advantage, making a good impression at first sight. This Sample Roll gives a business-like appearance; it is substantial and handsome, and invariably gives the impression that there is something valuable inside. All are anxious to see what it is you are carrying around with such carc. This is of importance as it secures attention and interest at the start. There is nothing like having your samples put up in 2 business-like shape; it gives a favorable impression from the ctart, which is half the battle. It is the same in all matters. A store that looks like business attracts customers; while, from a shanty store, you would not, as a rule, expect the best things. The fact is, in the agency business, as in every other business, you must have things fixed up just right if you expect to succeed. Our Brazil Silver Goods are the best that have ever been offered for the price, or anywhere near it. The new feature of being marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, free of cost, is the greatest popular hit of the times; and the Sample Roll is arranged so as to show the goods off to the best possible advantage. Furthermore, we carefully teach every agent just how to take advantage of all these splendid qualities and popular features. Is it any wonder that our agents succeed better than those who are working for other firms?

Cupid and Cap. Gregg.

Love's Wandering Astray, Being Episode Number 1.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

HE cook, the mate and the crew of the topmast schooner, Susan P. Gregg, Hobb's Harbor, Me., sat on the end of the scuttle butt mumbling to himself. Occasionally he emitted a growl like a sleigh runner screaking over bare ground. Then he fell to muttering ominously once more. It was evident that the cook, etc., of the Susan was not in an amiable mood.

The scene might have inspired more pleasant reflections. It was the sunset hour in the harbor at Newport, R. I. The blunt and weatherbeaten bows of the Susan swayed up soggily to meet the gentle surge. She had been anchored well up the harbor. All about her lay the spick and span yachts. Among them the Susan looked like a charwoman promenading Broadway. The cook, hunching his knees up under him glanced discontentedly out over the seamed rail at the shapely beauties swimming near on the rose-tinted flood.

"This is a thund'rin' nice place for us, now, hain't it?" he grumbled. "Here we are, lalligaggin' round here in this place lookin' like old Marm Jenkins would 'tendin' out on a Fifth Avenoo weddin' reception. That's what ye git by shippin' with a soft old fool."

Just then a yacht's tender conveying a merry party of smartly dressed society folk slipped around the bows of the old hooker. Instinctively the cook drew together the edges of a rent in the knee of his trousers and hooked his elbow over the place to conceal the difficulty.

The young women in the party made laughing comment on the aspect of the old craft.

That's jest it," grumbled the cook; "got to set here and have fun poked at us all because an old coot's gone to work and thinks he's got in love ag'in."

Seth got down off the scuttle butt and pulling a pin from the edge of his ragged vest "mollywhopped" the knee of his trousers together.

"I may be invited to a reception on one of them yachts there," he said to himself with grim satire, "so I might's well begin to slick up."

Seth was a tall young fellow just turned twenty. For several years he had sailed with the skipper of the Susan who needed only one man to assist him in managing the old craft. Cap. Skote Gregg was never in any great hurry. His father had owned the Susan Gregg before him. The schooner had been left, even shares, to Skote and his sister July Ann, a spinster who still kept the old home treasures well scrubbed up. When he was on shore Cap. Gregg lived there for he was a bachelor still.

farming operations on the home place. But he But he was able to put in more or less time on found it fairly profitable to make occasional trips to New York, carrying potatoes and apples down and bringing back general merchandise for the Hobb's Harbor folks.

Now it so happened a year before the time at which our log opens, the Susan through stress of weather had been obliged to wait at Newport until the skipper felt that the Cape Cod seas would be less spiteful in their cuffing.

Cap. Gregg had a cousin who lived in Newport and who was meat-cutter in a market. He seized the opportunity to make a call at the cousin's house. He was cordially received and before he had related all the Hobb's Harbor news tea-time had arrived and he was invited to remain. He stayed and spent the evening and the night, to the consternation of Seth who imagined that the skipper had been garroted in some back alley.

The cousin wished to procure a fourth hand for a little game of pede after supper and so he summoned in their next neighbor. He explained to Cap. Skote before she came, that she was a widow and that her husband had left her five thousand dollars in life insurance.

"Be a good chance for you, hey, Cap?" joked the cousin, prodding the skipper in the ribs. Be a mighty good chance if you wasn't hitched to Sophy the way you are."

Cap. Skote Gregg and Sophy Maxwell had been engaged to be married for nearly thirty years. But during the first fifteen years Sophy's mother had not been willing that the wedding should take place unless Cap. Gregg would agree to come and live with them. But the skipper on his part, was not willing to desert his own home. Then Sophy's mother died and her father was stricken with paralysis and it seemed to be her duty to stay with him until the end. Cap. Gregg was what the villagers called "slow motioned", and these setbacks to his matrimonial projects didn't worry him overmuch. He called on Sophy gravely, officially and regularly, and their engagement was one of the village land-marks. It became one of the things that the people dated from. The breaking of that engagement would have been as much of a local disaster as the carrying away of the Cow Nubble lighthouse.

Well, the widow came in on that evening that has been mentioned. Her name was Belle. She was slender and blonde and wistful. She wore a ribbon around her neck with the bow behind, and whenever one came near her he got a whiff of dainty perfume.

Cap. Gregg had never been in close proximity to a woman quite so charming as Belle. The women in Hobb's Harbor didn't wear those pretty crinkly shirt-waists. 'Twas either a calico gown or dress-up, formal black.

The Captain's wide-eyed and evident admiration seemed to attract the widow.

"It must be lovely to be a sea-captain and sail over the broad breast of the blue ocean away off to far lands," the widow said.

"Wal, the Susan coasts altogether, mum," replied the captain, "but still it's scrumptious enough in fair weather. We kind of slop along and take our own time on a trip."

"I have read a lot of sea-novels," said the widow, "and I know the life on the water must be perfectly entrancing. If I were a man I'd be a sea-captain and plough the deep, yo-ho."

"I enj'y it more'n I do farmin', myself," the skipper admitted. "The only thing is, a man gits lonesome, sort of, standin' there at the wheel all day and no one to talk to." He cast a languishing glance on the widow.

"How delightful it must be for a sea-captain to have his wife along with him," sighed the widow, so absorbed in contemplation that she nigged" twice on a trump lead, to the disgust of the cousin. "She could read to him as he steered and the fresh breath of the sea would be an inspiration."

"Yas, that's so," agreed the skipper. He was carrying seventy-five bags of superphosphate on that trip and he wondered guiltily how the "fresh breath" of that would affect the widow. But then, he didn't always carry superphosphate.

The skipper insisted on walking home with the widow though the cousin's wife said with some asperity that it wasn't necessary, because Belle lived only next door. The cousin's wife evidently didn't like the nature of the soft glances that had been passing across the table during the evening.

"The cap'n acts disgraceful for an engaged man," she sniffed scornfully to her husband after the pair had departed.

"Oh, these sailors is jest a little flirty," said the cousin.

"Well, a man fifty years old hain't got no right to be flirty," snapped the wife.

On his next trip to New York Cap. Gregg remained three days at Newport going, and a week coming back. Ostensibly he was visiting The Susan was out of commission about half his cousin for whom he seemed to have de- growled Seth, grinding his teeth. "He's gothe widow's piazza, next door.

When he went away the cousin's wife had a talk with him.

"Cap'n,"said she,"have you and Sophy broke your engagement?"

"Wal-er-haw-no," stammered the skipper. "Hain't plannin' to, are ye?" demanded the stern interrogator.

"Wal, the fact is, I hadn't thought much about it," said the skipper.

"The fact is," retorted the cousin's wife. you can't break that engagement and be decent about it, and you know it."

"Engagements have been bruk'," suggested the captain.

"Not engagements like this one of yours," asserted the woman. "Now Sophy Maxwell is one of my best old-time friends and she and I were close as sisters when I lived in Hobb's Harbor. Belle is jest as good a friend to me now. I hain't goin' to see you break no hearts, Cap'n Skote Gregg. I known what these gay sailors be to trifle with affections of poor confldin' women. We're glad to have you call on us when you come this way but if I hear of your makin' up ag'in to the Widder Beals across there I'll write home to Sophy and tell her all about it and I'll write and tell your sister, too. And I shall tell your sister jest how much time you are wasting here on every 'yage. She owns ha'f that schooner."

Cap. Gregg ran a dry tongue over his lip. Then he started to say something, but he refrained. He knew his cousin's wife's vocal ability pretty well and he didn't care to engage in joint debate with her. Besides, if he provoked her she would write a story home that would turn the village upside down. First of all his spinster sister would scalp him-and he knew her temper. And everyone would take the side of Sophy and he would be an outcast. Yet he had to confess to himself that he did love the widow. She was so different from all the women he had ever met. He hadn't dared to say a word to her on the subject of love but he had looked love all the time and he had begun to believe that at last she took a little interest in him. A thrill ran through his breast every time he thought of that possibility. Just to think of having a woman like that to take back to Hobb's Harbor!

But with his cousin's wife's steely eye on him, he went away from Newport without daring to see the widow again.

Now that was four months before the abovementioned evening when the cook, the mate and the crew of the Susan was sitting on the scuttle butt muttering his discontent. During those months the captain had made a noble try to root the memory of the widow from his heart. He had virtuously sailed past Newport on his way to New York. He had intended to keep straight back on his way to Maine. But that afternoon as the Susan swashed up the Sound the skipper's resolution suffered a slump. He then felt the need of someone to confide in. So he confided in Seth who sat near him on the rail.

"Sophy's a dretful good woman and all that, Seth," the skipper had concluded, "but when ye're in love you can't argue yourself out of it. I'm goin' to run into Newport. Now see here! I want ye to keep a still tongue in your head and I'll need you to help me. I know you've been shinin' up to the Sims girl there in the village. Now ye know I'm her guardeen. Do you love her, Seth?"

"You bet I do," replied the cook, the mate and the crew.

"Well, Seth, these fellows in love must stand together."

But Seth's face remained groomy. Like anv other inhabitant of Hobb's Harbor he looked on the breaking of the skipper's engagement to Sophy Maxwell as he would on the excision of one of the Ten Commandments from the decalogue. Further than that he had an idea that the captain was in the toils of a siren. Seth looked on all city women with suspicion. But above all, Seth realized that if the Susan put into Newport he would probably be left to kick his heels for a week-and he wanted to get back to the Sims girl. If the reader has been in love at twenty years of age he will understand what Seth's feelings were. But he didn't dare make protest to the skipper. The skipper had a temper when he was roiled.

So now at the sunset hour Seth was telling his sorrows to the sad sea waves. The skipper was down below primping up for a trip ashore.

After Seth had pinned up the tear in his trousers he tiptoed along and peered through the dingy window of the "house." "Look at the old fool!" he growled.

The skipper was standing before a cracked mirror with head thrown back and was trying to button a paper collar on to the neck band of his flannel shirt. "Look at the blamed dude!"

the time because the skipper still kept up his veloped a sudden and consuming affection. in' on shore to have a good time and be don't give a tunket about me."

All about on the yachts was the ripple gay laughter mingled with the chatter c' voices. The old rhyme was ringing through Seth's brain:-

"And they've all got a mate but me!"

He looked down on the skipper with renewed venom. The latter finding the windox obscured looked up. Seth was grimacing in his helpless rage but fortunately the window was too dirty for the skipper to distinguish that fact.

"Hey, Seth," he called, "come down here and black my shoes, will ye? I'm in a hurry." Seth obeyed with new rancor in his beart. Beside being everything on the Susan except skipper he was now turned into a bootblack.

"Hain't ye got no other pair of trousers but them, Seth?" asked the skipper looking on the torn knee with great disfavor.

"Naw," Seth answered sullenly, rubbing way at the captain's boots.

The skipper reflected a minute. "Well, it will be dark, anyway," he said. "But ye don't look much like a cupid. Still, ye needn't go in."

"Go in where?" inquired Seth.

"Look here, bub," explained the skipper. 'as I have told ye, Belle lives next door to my cousin's folks. Now I want you to do an errunt for me. · You've got to go ashore along 6 me and spy out to see if the coast is clear-see that the' hain't none of my cousin's folks about where they can see me. If they do they'll be writin' down to Hobb's Harborana then the kittle 'll bile over. Just knock on the widow's door and if ev'rything's all right tell her I'm comin' in to make a call."

"Wal, I sha'n't do no sech thing," snapped Setb.

"Harh-h-h?" yelled the skipper.

"I hain't goin' to do no sech errunt."

"Look here! You goin' to mutiny on me? I'll iron ye."

"I shipped as cook and 'fore the mast," said Seth sullenly, "and I didn't sign to do no marriage brokerin' bug'ness." "Then ye sha'n't call on the Sims girl no more," threatened the skipper.

Seth looked up at him surlily. "I'm her guardeen," continued the captain of the Susun, 'and what I say goes."

"Jest the same, I hain't goin' to do it." declared Seth with great decision.

The skipper threw down the comb with which he was trailing the long wet locks up over his bald poll. He grabbed Seth by the arm. "Say ye won't ag'in," he snarled, "and I'll dress ye down with a rope's end!"

"If ye're goin' to abuse me I'll have ter go," half-blubbered Seth.

"Here," commanded Capt. Skote, "put a couple more pins in them pants and come help me lower the yawl. It don't make no difference how sociable we git, ye still want to remember that I'm the captain of the Susan P. Gregg. Do ye think ye've got that in your head now?"

Seth jerked his head without speaking and when the skipper motioned to the companionway he stumbled up the narrow stairs a head. In silence he fumbled at the davit blocks where the yawl was suspended. Thus instantly was suppressed the only mutiny that ever occurred on board the Nusan P. Gregg.

Five minutes later Seth was rowing the weatherbeaten yawl across the heaving bress of the harbor of Newport.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY CHARLES EDWARD BARNS

ATIONAL calamities," said the City Editor, as he picked the cherry from the bottom of the vermouth glass, "seldom have a redeeming feature of humor. But something occurred at the office of the 'Daily Scythe' during the solemn hours that followed the recent Buffalo tragedy that, so far as I know, has never lapsed into print. It shows how the ludicrous will now and then creep into our gravest hours and somewhat mitigate their asperity. I trust no apologies are necessary-"

'None, unless you grow philosophic," remarked the Horse Editor of "The Woolgatherer," with soft sarcasm.

"Well, you know, 'Old Tim'-that's what we call the Manager-in-Chief,-came into the City room a couple of months ago and glanced over a bevy of reporters who sat there waiting for assignments. 'My private secretary is dead or married or something,' he explained sourly to me, 'and I want someone to fill his place.' Caleb Bemis, a raw young recruit from somewhere up in Vermont, sprang to his feet, and volunteered with such alacrity and afterward fulfilled the position with such efficiency that when the former Secretary returned, there was 'nothing doing,' as the boys say. Caleb was a fixture.

"It seems that Caleb was the town prodigy of Fairplains in the land of wooden nutmegs and maple sugar. He had taken the high school prize, and the Vermont town Macænas-you know there always is one-sent Caleb to some obscure college where he was graduated with all the honors they could afford to give any one man without going bankrupt. When Caleb returned to his native hamlet he was quite a hero, particularly as while at college he had written several 'pieces for the paper,' and everybody predicted a big future for him when he resolved to leave his native home and strike out for himself in the perilous waters of journalism.

"'And when you get to New York, Caleb, said the editor of the 'Fairplains Weekly Budget,' 'if you will send me a weekly letter, anything from a column up, I'll send you two dol-You know we can't pay so high as those city fellows, but we'll give you a heap sight more glory.' So Caleb spent one night every week perspiring over a yellow pad, penning the news of the great metropolis to the provincial Vermont town, and if the circulation was not increased thereby, at least there was no falling off, for the two dollars came with regularity. Then the private secretaryship to the Manager-in-Chief fell like a meteor upon Caleb out of a clear sky, and he grew am-

"His letters now gathered a certain momentum with increased honors and responsibilities. The editor of the 'Budget' increased Caleb's stipend to three dollars per week, curtailing expenses somewhere else to make up for it, and never failed to stop dear old Mrs. Bemis on the street whenever he saw her, and congratulate her upon the brilliant promise of her only son, till at last the woman's head was quite turned with pride. But as 'pride goeth before a fall,' here is the story.

"You remember when the news was flashed over the wires on that dark Friday from the everybody on the continent seemed paralyzed. sorts of surprises at any and every hour of the day, sat back in his chair perfectly flabbergasted, and for the first time in his life did nothing for thirty consecutive seconds but stare into space and think, his long claws clutching the dragon's-head arms of his chair. Beside him sat his faithful secretary, muttering to himself, as did a million other good Americans at that moment, 'What! The President shot? Impossible! It is a rumor-a practical joke-a lie!' But when the confirming tidings came in from every side and the great presses began to thunder out their 'extras,' Caleb turned his thoughts homeward. 'Cæsar!' he exclaimed. 'What a beat for the 'Budget!' My home paper out on Saturday morning, and even now is 'making ready.' I'll wire the news on instantly.' So Caleb rushed to the telegraph room.

"The editor of the 'Fairplain Weekly Budget' was just in the act of blue-penciling the last opinion of 'Vox Populi' and 'Pro Bono Publico' preparatory to 'making up the forms' and going to press when the station agent, who was his own operator and messenger-boy, rushed in and laid the yellow envelope before the editor. Telegrams did not come so often longer to give a thrill of misgiving; but when the old gentleman drew down his 'specks' from his grizzled forehead and read the damp thousand dollars a month for cable and telescrawl, he simply sat back and groaned. 'Poor Caleb!' he murmured. 'He has gone stark raving mad. 'President shot,' indeed! What inside the office and then peddled in the provdoes he think I am? And such a brilliant young mind too. Dear, dear! I do hope no one will hear of this. I can't understand it. Either Caleb Bemis has gone crazy, or else he has gotten into bad company and taken to drink. At any rate, I must see his mother. Bless her heart! what a blow this will be to her. Seizing his battered tile, the editor and proprietor a new private secretary. of the 'Budget' hurried out into the closing day and started up the hill to the Bemis cotage.

"The good mother saw the terrible look in her visitor's eyes, and the yellow sheet in his right hand gave her a sudden faintness. She met the bent figure and solemn countenance with blanched cheeks. 'What has happened to Caleb? Quick, tell me, Squire. Is he—is he "'No, Mrs. Bemis, not dead, only raving that!'

"The poor mother took the sheet, read it, then dropped into her armchair, sobbing. 'Oh, this is awful!' she wept. 'I knew that something would happen if Caleb went to that wicked city. Oh, why did he not stay here where he would be out of temptation? And he never drank a thing in his life before-I am sure of it. Oh, Squire, please be lenient with him. I'm sure it was only a little practical joke, or something like that. I'll write him to come home immediately and apologize. Shall I pay you for the message?'

" 'It was paid, Madam,' said the Squire, as if this only confirmed the evidence of Caleb's terpitude or insanity. 'I'll be easy with him, Madam, but this must not pass unnoticed. I shall refuse hereafter to publish your son's weekly effusions, and the three dollars per week will cease. That's all, Madam. Good evening!' And the Editor, with his duty done, sauntered back toward the office with his nose in the air, while poor weeping Maria Bemis sat down and poured forth her heart in a prayer of appeal to her son to account for his crazy telegram to the editor of the 'Budget,' and to come home before he had lapsed into such iniquities as would certainly bring him to hopeless ruin. This letter she despatched with her own hand.

"The next morning the townsfolks of Fairplain read a paragraph which began:

"Our late young fellow townsman, Caleb Bemis, was always a practical joker, but it might be better for him if he left off boyish might be better for him it he left off boylsa things now that he is a man. Practical jokes are sometimes very grave affairs, and involve people in serious difficulties. It is not our intention to be unduly hard on Caleb, but the gravity of the offence, even though it be his first since he has become a sojourner of the wicked city of New York, demands that, etc., etc."

"The Squire slept a little later than usual that morning, and was aroused from a nightmare in the full glare of day by his good wife who burst upon him like a thunderbolt. 'Richard, Richard!' she cried out, ramming her fingers into his ribs, 'do you know that Caleb Bemis's telegram was true? The President was shot at Buffalo yesterday afternoon, 'by a man who concealed a revolver in a handkerchief,' just as he told it. Here is the Burlington Courier' extra. You may doubt Caleb or even me, but you never doubted the 'Courier,' in your life. There, read it! The whole town of Fairplain has turned into the streets. Come and see for yourself.'

"The old Squire had struggled up on his pillow, the very picture of a criminal reading his death-warrant. He scanned the flaming sheet before him, then flopped back moaning. 'My heavens! And here I missed the 'scoop' of my life. What shall I do, what shall I do?

"Of course when Caleb received the copy of the 'Fairplain Weekly Budget' which did not Exposition grounds at Buffalo, everything and contain his great 'beat,' but instead of which made an editorial at the 'scooper' that was all Even 'Old Tim,' used as he was to receiving all but mortal, Caleb was very angry; but his rounded by four huge barns where fancy stock mother's letter-that made him simply furious. was kept-cattle that make Holbrook-on-the-Nor did the special delivery letters which followed that day, one from the proud woman on the hilltop and the other from the Squire, in the least appease him. The Editor's missive was most abject, the more so in that the 'Budget' had lost the opportunity of fourfolding its circulation at one bound. 'I shall come out editorially retracting my idiotic statement about practical jokes, Hiram,' the Squire's letter ran, 'and I shall continue your weekly letters at five dollars per, even if I must discharge the 'devil' and ink the forms myself to do it. And one thing more, Caleb, never, never again will I hesitate when you send me any communication, by telegraph or otherwise. I will print it in full on the front page in double-leaded black face, giving you all the glory,' etc., etc.

"But upon this letter Caleb gnashed his teeth. The one grand coup of his life had fizzled out like a bomb that fails to explode.

"But the worst was to come. Somehow in the office the story leaked out within a week, and 'Old Tim' the Manager-in-Chief got on the windward side. It was his turn now to be furious. 'See here, Caleb,' he said savagely as to the 'Budget' office that they failed any he came in after his chops and mug of musty farm hands heard the splash far below. Next

Your week is up today, sir. Leave the office and take a year's vacation at your own expense. When you come back perhaps you will know a good thing well enough to nurse it when you've got hold of it. That will do, sir. Good day!' And 'Old Tim' stalked out into the City room to look over the recruits for "Poor Caleb was in despair. He packed up his trumperies in awful silence and strode down the rear stair, mentally wishing that the 'Fairplain Weekly Budget,' together with its bungling editor was in the depths of Purgator. With bowed head he passed into the street, wending slowly and sadly by a noisy telegraph office. At last he paused, for a furious desire to be avenged surged upon him. It was Friday-just one week from the 'scoop' that failed. There was a moment's hesitation, crazy-or perhaps worse-dead drunk. Read then in he plunged in the heat of resolve. "Print anything I write, eh, and 'in full on the front page in double-leaded black face,' eh? Well, let's see if he will print this!" And he sat down to the yellow pad and wrote:-

> "Emperor William and Edward VII met on the field of honor at Homburg and settled their long feud for supremacy over England. Li Hung Chang and 'Oom Paul' were seconds, Li Hung Chang and 'Oom Paul' were seconds, the weapons being automobiles driven at the rate of three miles a minute straight toward each other full head on by chaffeurs in full steel armor. His Majesty the King was killed outright and Emperor William, although badly mangled, was taken to England in Santo-Dumont's balloon and crowned King of England at Westminster Abbey. Great excitement. 89 words, Paid. RUSH!"

> "The next day the 'Fairplain Weekly Budget' came out with the terrible tidings in full! A week later in consequence, it went into the hands of the sheriff.

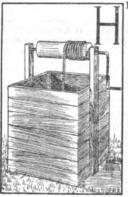

> "And where is the brilliant Caleb?" queried the Horse Editor.

> The narrator lighted a Perfecto. "Dunno." he answered gravely. "The last I heard of him. he was opening oysters in Washington market at forty cents a bushel."

IS face was very pale as he rushed into the country store postoffice and faced us who sat about the sheetiron stove talking horse and politics.

"Well, Tim, what's the matter?" queried one upon looking up and seeing that apparition of distress. There was a deep silence.

For some few seconds the man's lips moved without making a sound. Then at last he became articulate. "There are five men down in Peterson's well and we can't get them out. For God's sake, come and help-quick!"

Instantly the place was in confusion. Every man leaped to his feet and began scrambling over overturned chairs and trumperies. "Ropes -tackle-hurry, hurry!"

Within half a minute six men were hurrying down the village street at dead run, each carrying a coil of rope, a bunch of tackle or some sort of grappling hooks. Every man knew what it was to take his own life in his hands in emergency. The Peterson well stood in the centre of a great space at the edge of the town, sur-Sound famous throughout the country. It was a very deep well, wide at the mouth and slightly tapering toward the bottom, after the manner of wells dug in the last century, and seemingly inexhaustible in supply. Unfortunately, however, the Peterson well had a habit of giving out about the time of the first frost, and it was the perilous task of someone to go below and give it a thorough cleaning to admit the inflow from the springs that fed it. It was said that within the century and a half of its existence more than one poor fellow had been seized and strangled in those black depths by the mysterious she-devil who was supposed to inhabit it, and the legends of the old well were so numerous and uncanny, and the place was regarded with such awe by the superstitious farm hands and others who watered the stock about its rockbound mouth, that few were found brave enough to approach it after nightfall. It was even related that when on a summer night a wayside tramp stopped at the well to quench his thirst, a frightful object rose full length out of the black depths, seized the stranger by the throat and threw him bodily down into the cavern, and that three

But one thing was now certain: there were five men at the bottom of Peterson's well, and around the open maw there was half the village of Holbrook, running hither and thither like maniacs, hundreds to give orders and none to execute them. The village Solon was there.

the oldest doctor and the youngest lawyer, the wag, the scapegoat and two ministers of the gospel. But whereas they all differed in ordinary life, they were intensely similar under this mighty stress of tragedy-alike staggered with the problem: how to get those men out of the well.

The five men were seated perfectly motionless in the mud far below, knees drawn up under their chins, heads thrown back, mouths agape and eyes wide open, looking straight up, unheeding of all cries and exhortations. In vain were ropes dangled before their very eyes and wild shouts from above ordered them to seize this succor and so be drawn up to safety. Then someone tied a hook to one of the ropes and set about angling for the unconscious men, catching the hook in their clothing, but except to rip off pieces of their clothing, nothing was accomplished. The village Solon in the meantime let down a lighted candle, but before it had gone twenty feet of the way, it flickered and died. "Carbonic acid gas," he said with quiet solemnity, and ordered someone to run and ring the fire alarm. How a fire engine could rescue five men from the bottom of a well did not appear plain to anyone within hearing, so nobody obeyed the order, although it was plain at least to the worthy gentleman himself that before it was safe for anyone to enter the well. it must first be pumped out of a gas heavier than air-which takes time. But here the village patriarch interposed. "It is as much as your life is worth, Danny," "It is as much as your five is worth, Danny, he said.

"Do you think I'm afraid of the green devil down there?" he shot back ironically.
"No, but that well is filled with deadly gas. One breath and you are lost."
"Then I'll not breathe. Come on, boys. Give me a hand here."

Back over the mouth of the well the huge windlass was drawn, the sudden hero of the hour seized the end of the rope and wound it twice around him, then said quietly, "Remember, let me shoot clean to the bottom. There I'll seize one of the men, then haul away for dear life. Are you ready?"

There were one or two choking replies from the strong men at the windlass, then Dan Findlay swelled his lungs and exhaled five successive times, and with a final filling of fresh air, gave the signal and down he went like a shot, sixty-nine feet of rope reeling off as from a surveyor's tape. Some one leaned over the coping and grief ("He's get one) Hard fresh air, gave the signal and down he went like a shot, sixty-nine feet of rope reeling off as from a surveyor's tape. Some one leaned over the coping and cried, "He's got one! Haul away boys—quick, quick!" But the windlass was too slow, so the rope was started over the coping, seized by a hundred hands and run out through the crowd. It was a moment of horrible suspense, then a shout went up as the dishevelled head of Danny Findlay popped up over the wooden wall. There in the giant arms was seen the limp form of one of the Hungarian workmen. That shout rumbled over the hills and was not lost till it rolled far out over the bay and even half way across the Sound to Connecticut. Eager hands seized both the rescued and the rescuer, bearing the former away for the doctors to work over.

Dan stood at the edge of the coping, panting furiously, trembling a little as a man might who has been lowered into the very jaws of death and been dragged out again, but he tightened the rope about his body again as he said, "You see, boys, it wasn't so hard after all. Now for the next man down there. Are you ready?"

Again there were murmurs of admonition, but they were fewer; and many, no longer able to stand the strain, turned away.
The next one of the martyrs came to the surface in the grip of the bronze arms with greater speed and fewer dangerous joltings on the way, for it was a bruising business at best. Dan was a trifle paler, perhaps, but success thus far whetted him only to surer action in behalf of the others that remained below. Another corps of doctors began working over the second victim on the floor of the near-by granery, and down went Dan for the third.

As he came to the air after that terrible journey this time, it was seen that the hero was ney this time, it was seen that the hero was somewhat weaker, although the shouts of acclaim that greeted him were enough to make any man's blood stir with delicious pride and confidence. Still no one offered to relieve him at the task, half in reluctance to take from the brave lad's honors, but more in fear of going down and never returning to the light of day again. So, with a dozen strong inflations, he seized the rope and gave the signal to let him drop. As he shot downward one of the men at the windless caught the gleam of his even of nev this time, it was seen that the hero drop. pitched forward on his face and the rope lay along the ground.

"My God!" cried one. "Danny has slipped through the rope!" Simultaneously the empty noose shot out of the well and a hundred souls stood transfixed with horror. Rescued and rescuer lay together far below in the embrace of the she-fiend of Peterson's well.

It was in the midst of this that Judie came. Now Judie Marr was the daughter of a fisherman who had found that his hut stood upon a desirable eminence, and with his little sav-

It prospered and "Uncle" Dick Marr gave up the nets and clam-baskets for tavern life, which was more and "Uncle" Dick Marr gave up the nets and clam-baskets for tavern life, which was more lucrative and easy, particularly as city people from New York way, distant not more than forty miles, liked the tang of "Uncle Dick's" musty ale and the flavor of his planked bluefish. But man of the sea he was, and all of his progeny thereafter, even to Judie, his only daughter, who took to water like a young seagull. She rowed and she sailed and she swam, happiest when the spray made her red cheeks glisten in the sunlight and the green weeds tangled her hair, and Danny Findlay was the only man she had ever loved or thought she ever could love until—well, until that swimming contest in which Judie competed with seven men, all expert swimmers at the Holbrook tournament, and thereby incurred the displeasure of her adorer who regarded manly sports like these quite unwomanly, however fair femininity might succeed in the contest.

The worst of it was that Judie was barred from the contest simply because she was a woman, and yet at the very moment of the pistol shot, bobbed her brown head out of the water man, and yet at the very moment of the pistol shot, bobbed her brown head out of the water in the very midst of the contestants like a mermaid. It made a great sensation, for where she came from or how she got there at the very critical moment nobody ever knew. She simply arose like Venus from the Cyprian wave, struck out a little in the lead and kept the pace for two miles, clean to the turning post and back again. Everybody was delighted, even old "Uncle Dick" Marr, who chuckled proudly and chaffed the champions unmercifully when the cup presentation took place. The winner among the men had taken the silver tankard, but Judie had taken the laurels, and everybody was delighted—except Danny Findlay. He was furious and made no secret of it.

Nobody overheard the quarrel which followed man, and yet at the very moment of the pistol

Nobody overheard the quarrel which followed for the lovers had gone down on the open beach, where there were no eavesdropers other than crawfish and two deaf clamdiggers up to their knees in mud half a mile away. But the consequences were seen to be irreparable, for Dan stuck close to his cooper's bench and Dan stuck close to his cooper's bench and played tattoos on the hoops from daybreak till dark, scarcely lifting his eyes save to eat and sleep, and the grass grew over the little by-path which he took twice daily through the meadow and up the bluff to the rear of "Uncle Dick's" hostelry that gleamed white and stately over the sea. But now a tragedy had brought Dan out of his sullen seclusion, and as it gathered at the old well nearly the entire populace for miles around, it also brought Judie.

Dan there that the mettlesome sprite would have kept aloof. But approaching the scene of disaster, her heart harrowed with these sights and sounds, she was well at the coping's side before she realized that it was not merely some foreign laborer in whom she had no interest who lay there in the clutch of the she-devil of Peterson's well, but the man to whom she had once sworn vows of constancy and love, and she could not forget it. Without a word, without a query in even so much as an eyeglance, Judie leaped the coping, seized the end of the noose, threw it around her, and before any one realized was already letting herself down with the slack of the rope over the windlass.

There were wild shouts, but nothing availed. With jaws set and every sinew stiffened, she slid down like a sailor swinging from a yardarm, and the people above only came to their senses when she had reached the bottom. There they saw her unbind herself, twisting the rope about Dan Findlay's form, then give the signal. Up flew the insensible body as if blown out of a cannon, and in a few seconds down came the dangling noose again.

"Save yourself, Judie! Quick, bind the rope around you. One breath and you are lost!" But the girl who had swam half way across Holbrook Bay under water and bobbed up serenely in the midst of a championship race, and won it too, was not to be dictated to. Around the body of the fifth victim the rope was drawn taut, and with the signal, up it shot like the other. like the other.

Meantime the seconds were reeling off and the fair face was purpling. It was but a few clock-ticks to the grave now, and she knew it. She seized the dangling noose in her weakening hand then looked up. Only one heard the faint query—"Danny—dead?" Then as the answer volleyed down in a chorus after a moment's explanation, "No, no, no!" the brave girl drew the loop about her and made fast with a sailor's knot, just as her knees sank girl drew the loop about her and made fast with a sailor's knot, just as her knees sank beneath her and she pitched forward, fainting, suspended in the very maw of Death. Slowly, breathlessly lest the limp lithe form slip from the grip of the hemp, the little heroine was drawn to the surface, and simultaneously a score of hands seized the bedraggled skirts and clung for life. A moment later Judie lay calmly upon the grass, blinking into familiar and anxious faces that bent about her.

and anxious faces that bent about her.

Two days later, a Sabbath afternoon, Dan and Judie were walking down the same beach that witnessed their recent quarrel, but they were in no mood for battle now. "Explain something to me," he said. "They tell me that while you were at the bottom of Peterson's well before you tied the rope around you, you asked if I were living or dead. Suppose they had told you that I was dead—what then?"

"I should have staid there" was the quiet.

"I should have staid there," was the quiet answer, not without a tremor. Then after a pause. "You have not told me why you risked your life for them who were nothing to you, even when their own people dared not. Was it beroism?" heroism?

"People may call it heroism, but it wasn't.

"And since our first quarrel has ended so famously for us all, we will not risk the outcome of a second, will we, Danny!"—

But the reply was cut short by the shrill old fisherman's call down from the bluff above. "Ahoy, there—ahoy, there! Your tea is getting cold, my children!"

HE only reason why Squire Todd hesitated a few days about telling Miss Trundy was because she had been in his family so long that he felt she might be grieved if she had to seek a new home.

But one morning as he waited for his butter to melt on the flapjacks the Squire thought to himself, "Well I may as well out with it 'cause

'tain't any of her business anyway, as you might say."

"Er-r hum-m-m!" he bellowed very suddenly and Miss Trundy who had just passed him his cup of coffee peered at him over her spectacles in some surprise.

"Ain't ketchin' cold be ye, Squire?" she asked.

"No, been catchin' something else," the Squire blurted out. Then if it were possible for a blush to struggle through the tough and wrinkled skin of his cheek there certainly was a blush on the Squire's face. "That sounds sort of youngish and foolish for me to talk that way," he half apologized, "but it kind of slipped out. Fact is, Mari', I'm reckoning on gettin' married. There!"

There was a rather singular expression on Miss Trundy's face but she poured a cup of coffee for herself and said quite calmly, "I heerd something about you showin' some attentions but I hain't skursely believed nothin' in it. I know that lawyers have lots of busi-in it. I know that lawyers have lots of business to attend to for women folks and I reckoned prob'ly that the neighbors were makin' a great touse over nothin.' But of course now that you say so I sha'n't stand up any longer and contradict."

"No, we might's well own up, Mari' so long's it's a settled thing," assented the Squire cheerfully.

"She's Mis' Jetts?" half inquired, half asserted Miss Trundy.

"She's the one," he assented, slicing down through the flapjack tier.

"I've this to say of her," said Miss Trundy, "she's a real nice woman and stands well and I understand that Mister Jetts left some money. I hain't surprised at all that you should take to her. But ain't she a dite young for you, Squire—not that you're an old man—not real old. But I reckon Mis' Jetts can't be over thutty-five, eh?"

"Goir' on thutty-five," said the Squire.

both think that we shall be perfectly comfortable."

"I hope so, Squire," returned Miss Trundy.

"When will ye—when is—when had I better plan to pack up?" In spite of Miss Trundy's evident resolution to treat the matter in a business way her eyes grew dim with tears.

"I know just how you feel about leaving here," said the Squire, "and I wish it was so that you could stay. Mis' Jetts was tellin' me the other day that she thought a great deal of you and all that but she said that no house can have two mistresses and she knows you have been mistress here so long that you couldn't get used to havin' some one steppin' in over you. Besides, there'll only be the two of us and we prob'ly sha'n't keep help for a while for Mis' Jetts says she likes housework."

"I know jest how she feels," Miss Trundy replied, "and any woman would be took the same way. I should myself. Course I expected to go. But you know when any one has been in a house so long as I have it's kind of pullin' to leave. Why, Squire, do you realize how many years I've been here doin' housework? I come two years after you were married, when I was sixteen!"

"I d'know what I'd done," said the Squis "If I hadn't had ye to take hold and do afte Mis' Todd died. Ye brought up the boys lis a mother." He looked at her a moment with Mis' Todd died. Ye brought up the boys ha mother." He looked at her a moment with twinkle in his eye. Then with his accustome bluntness he said, "I really did think or end of proposin' to ye, Mari'. The Sense of Direction in the Lower Animals.

BY PROF. JAMES WEIR, JR. M. D.

is a well-established fact that horses, cattle, dogs, cats, and others of the higher animals, possess the sense of direction in a marked degree, and can find their way home, from distant points, over roads utterly and entirely unfamiliar to them. The homing instinct of the carrier pigeon has been utila well-established pigeon has been utilized for the transmission of messages, both in times of peace and in times of war. During the seige of Paris, the outside world got all its news from the be-the outside world got all its news from the beleaguered city through the agency of this novel postal service. There are many animals much lower in the scale of animal life which possess the sense of direction and are able to find their homes again, when transported into unfamiliar scenes and surroundings. These animals are able, also, to go to and from new feeding grounds, over comparatively unknown roads, with a degree of certainty that is very remarkable. This sense of direction has been noticed even in microscopic animals. I have seen certain whizopods, which had been driven away from their feeding-ground, a minute tuft of an alga, return to it again, after their enemy, a water-louse, had disappeared. This whizopod is a death-feigner. disappeared. This whizopod is a death-feigner. Whenever the water-louse comes near them they fold their little hair-like feet, feign death, they fold their little hair-like feet, feign death, and sink. As soon as the water-louse swims out of their neighborhood, the whizopods will swim back and resume feeding.

Snails possess this special sense and have given evidences of their knowledge of direction to several observers. My grounds are surrounded by a brick wall capped with slabs of brown sand-stone. Beneath the projecting edges of these stone blocks, many snails find secure and pleasant domiciles. In the afternoon of June 18th I took from beneath these stones eleven snails, marked their shells with white paint, and then set them free on the lawn fifty feet distant from the wall. On the morning of June 19th I found that two of these marked snails had returned to their homes beneath the appeared, and was traced by its track of slime over a wall into an adjoining well-stocked garden. Mr. Lonsdale concluded that it had deserted its sickly mate; but after an absence of twenty-four hours it returned, and apparently communicated the result of its successful exploration, for both then started along the same track, and disappeared over the wall." The healthy snail remembered where it had left its sickly mate, and knew how to find it again, after its journey of discovery.

The limpet has the homing instinct largely developed. Lieutenant Willoughby Markhame R. N. told me, that on one occasion he had kept the same limpet under observation for several months, and that it always returned to the same hole in the rock, after its excursions in search of food. Another English scientist, Mr. J. Clarke Hawkshow, is quoted by Romannes in Animal Intelligence p. 29 as follows: "A limpet had formed a clearing on a sea-weed covered block of chalk. In the midst of this clearing was a pedestal of flint rather more than one inch in diameter, standing up above the surface of the chalk, it projected so much that a tap from my hammer broke it off. On the top of the smooth fractured surface of this flint the occupant of the clearing had taken up its abode. The shell was closely adapted to the uneven surface, which it would only fit in one position. The cleared surface was in a hollow with several small natural cavities, where the limpet could have found a pit ready made to shelter in; yet it preferred, after each excursion, to climb up to the top of the flint, the most exposed point in all its domain.

Ants have the sense of direction and, consequently, the homing instinct, wonderfully developed. Sir John Lubbock successfully proved this fact in quite a number of interesting experiments. He accustomed some ants to go to and fro over a wooden bridge to some food. When they had got accustomed to the way, he watched until an ant was on the bridge go to and fro over a wooden bridge to some food. When they had got accustomed to the way, he watched until an ant was on the bridge and then turned the bridge around. The ant at once turned and proceeded in the direction she was going before the bridge was turned. On the 16th of July I killed a caterpillar and pinned it on a beech tree, on the opposite side of which was the entrance to the nest or colony of red ants. In about an hour's time the dead grub was discovered by an ant. She attempted to drag it away, but was prevented by the pin. She then raced into the nest, not before, however, I had gently marked her with a spot of white paint. I carefully traced her road home on the tree with a blue pencil. In a few moments she came out of the nest accompanied by six companions and went toward her quarry way, he watched until an ant was on the bridge by six companions and went toward her quarry June 19th I found that two of these marked sails had returned to their homes beneath the stone slabs. On the morning of June 20th, six more of them had safely reached their homes. I am confident that the remaining three were destroyed by black birds which are inordinately fond of snails, and quite a number of which I noticed, in the afternoon of June 19th, feeding on the lawn. They mash the snail's shell with their powerful beaks, and then tear out the soft structures, and eagerly devour them. Darwin says in his Descent of Man p. 262: "These animals (snails), appear attachment; an accurate observer, Mr. Lonstale, informs me that he placed a pair of landsnails (Heliz pomatia), one of which was weakly, into a small and ill-provided garden. After a time the strong and healthy individual dis-sult; the ant who discovered the grub and went to the nest for assistance, returning over a new route, this time below the pencil tracing of her road when she went to the nest to convey information of her find. On July 20th I marked ten black ants with white paint and set them free one-hundred yards from their nest. This nest was beneath a brick pavement, which leads from my front door to the entrance-gate, and which is just three hundred feet long. The ants were set free at 4.30 P. M. at the first two discovered the grub and book and three feet from, her den. I then struck the table. She came out at once, and immediately began to stalk the fiy. This experiment showed conclusively that the spider, at least, could see a fly at the distance of three feet. Bees, also, possess the sense of direction in a were performed some years ago, by me, with some Italian bees taken from the apiary of Mr. Stone. Twenty bees were marked with white paint, and carried, in a closed box, three miles from their hive, (a measured distance from trance-gate, and which is just three hundred feet long. The ants were set free at 4.30 P. M. at the front entrance to the pavement, and all but two of them had returned to the nest, at the other extremity of the pavement, by 6 P. M. The two remaining ants had not arrived at the nest by 6.30 P. M., nor could I find them anywhere on the pavement. On July 21st I marked fifteen ants and set them free in the grass sixty feet from the nest. This was at 4 P. M. At 6 P. M. the first marked ant came back to the nest; at 6.20 the second ant came back; at 6.45 two ants came back; at 6.50 two ants arrived; at 7.15 one ant arrived; at 7.20 one ant arrived. I then discontinued my watch. Ants, as well as many other insects, are thoroughly familiar with objects immediately surrounding their dwelling places. I am convinced, that all animals which have sight, use their eyes in finding their way back to their homes. One can tell, when an ant is nearing its nest, by its actions; there is no deviation from a straight line when it comes in sight of familiar landmarks. Ants use sight to assist their sense of direction, and I have repeatedly seen them climb to the tops of small blades of grass, for no other purpose than to take observations. In another paper on "The Senses in the Lower Animals," I have stated, that the range of an ant's vision does not exceed twelve or fourteen inches. Some of my recent experiments lead me to correct this statement, for some species of ants have a visual range of at least twenty-four inches. The praying mantis some species of ants have a visual range of at least twenty-four inches. The praying mantis is an insectivorous insect, and its favorite food is an insectivorous insect, and its favorite food is the ant. I placed a mantis on a table and then set free an ant on the same table at some distance from it, probably three feet. The ant ran rapidly in the direction of the mantis until within two feet of it. She then caught sight of her enemy, and suddenly crouched down on the table. She remained a second immovable, then, in panic terror, turned and fled in an opposite direction. I performed the experiment eleven times with the common large red ant. In every instance the ant was able to see her enemy at a distance of from twenty to twenty-five inches. five inches.

The range of vision in some spiders is much greater than has been taught before. Especially is this true in the case of the hunting-spiders. These spiders spin no trap-webs, and secure their food by creeping up, unawares, and springing on their victims before they can escape. I have repeatedly seen these spiders stalking flies at the measured distance of two and even three feet. A large hunting-spider posite to, and three feet from, her den. I then struck the table. She came out at once, and immediately began to stalk the fly. This experiment showed conclusively that the spider, at least, could see a fly at the distance of three feet. Bees, also, possess the sense of direction in a marked degree. The following experiments were performed some years ago, by me, with some Italian bees taken from the apiary of Mr. Stone. Twenty bees were marked with white paint, and carried, in a closed box, three miles from their hive, (a measured distance from point to point of 2576 yards.) They were then set free. This was at 11.30 A. M. The first bee came back to the hive at 12.30 P. M; three bees came back at 12.35; two bees came back at 12.37; two bees came back at 12.40; one bee came back at 2.15; one bee came back at 3.25. A watch was kept until 6 P. M., but no other marked bees came in. A week after this experiment, I took twenty bees and blinded them by painting their eyes with a mixture of gumarabic and white lead. These bees were taken to the same point as in the first experiment, and then set free. Not one of them ever came back to the hive. From the result of this experiment, I am convinced, that sight is a necessary adjunct to the special sense of direction, in all animals that possess image-producing eyes. sary adjunct to the special sense of direction, in all animals that possess image-producing eyes.

The great Kadiak bear has become famous during the past few years, as not only the biggest of all the bear family, but the largest carnivorous animal now in the world. Last year the Smithsonian Institution offered a reward of $50 for every cub bear of this specie turned over to its agents, while the officials of the New York institution made an offer of two hundred and fifty dollars for each cub. This year, it is understood, an increase has been made in the case of each bonus and notices of the reward are being posted along the Alaskan coast and on Kadiak Island. This is because it is feared that the fate of the buffalo will overtake these monster Alaskan animals and the species will be exterminated. monster Alaskan animals and the species will be exterminated,

It is hoped that the close of the present year will place naturalists in possession of the long sought definite information regarding the giants of the animal world. Three expeditions are now under way or planned with this object in view, and the wealthy men who are behind each project are displaying something of the enthusiasm which actuates the "backers" of Arctic expeditions.

In contrast to this giant is the St. Elias bear, the smallest bear in the world. This latter animal, which derives its name from the famous Alaskan peak, is little larger than a sheep and not only is there no specimen in captivity, but (CONTINUED ON PAGE 24).

with English life that many people forget that this brilliantly gifted woman is an American. Her grandfather was a New York clergyman, while her father, who was John Morgan Richards, was a resident of Boston where Mrs. Craigie was born a little more than thirty years ago. Mrs. Craigie had a cosmopolitan sort of education, but it was very thorough so that the light and sparkle of her writing is but the gleam upon very solid scholastic attainments. Moral, was published in 1891 and attracted immediate and general attention. Serious problems of life are treated in a sketchy and conversational manner while the book is stuck full of epigrams. Many novels followed this first one. Their titles are cumbersome but curiously distinctive, as witness: A Study in Temptations, Journeys End in Lovers' Meetings, and The Gods, Some Mortals, and Lord Wickenham. Mrs. Cragie has had success as a playright. "The Ambassadors" is her most successful dramatic venture, and was first presented in 1898. Previous to this a one act play of hers had been presented by Miss Ellen Terry. Mrs. Craigie's latest book is The Serious Wooing, which deals in a characteristically "advanced" manner with the marriage and divorce prob-

Signor Guglielmo Marconi has suddenly become one of the most famous men in the world through his undoubted success in transmitting a message across the Atlantic without wires. The cable company at St. John, Newfoundland, showed that they realized what his accomplishment meant to the entire telegraphic systems of the world when they endeavored to get an injunction forbidding further experiments on the ground that it invaded their rights. Signor Marconi's station was erected on Signal Hill at the entrance to the harbor of St. John. The other end of the "line" is in Cornwall, 1800 miles distant. Here at Poldhu he has a most powerful electric station. A kite attached to a wire was elevated at certain hours agreed upon and again and again the letter "S" was spelled out by three quick dots or strokes. If the system is perfected it means that ships in passage may receive messages at any time as they now do when within a few miles of land. This has been done so often and so successfully that it has ceased to excite comment but it was hardly thought possible to annihilate space and distance and reach the Old World as Marconi has done. Signor Marconi says that the theory of electric waves as demonstrated by Hertz is the and every form of civic indifference. basis of his work. The electric vein passes through any solid substance like a wave or rock and fog does not interfere in the least. Many messages may be sent in different directions at the same time. Signor Marconi was born near Bologna, Italy, in 1874. When he was but twenty-two years of age he came into prominence and even before this time he had demonstrated in Italy that by means of the Hertzian waves, wires could be dispensed with. In spite of his success however his experiments attracted little attention in Italy and it was not until he went to England in 1896 that he received proper and adequate financial support. Since then his work in England and America has had scientific and financial backing and he has at last solved one of the greatest possibilities of electricity.

His wife claims as her relatives many influential people among whom is the Princess de Chimay whose elopement with a gypsy fiddler made her notorious. Captain Streeter has much solid backing in his lawsuit and will be either a millionaire or a pauper.

The captain of the United States training ship Lancaster is Captain George P. Colvocoresses, a most popular official. His Greek name recalls the interesting life story of the father of the captain. Many years ago an American cruiser sent a boat ashore to the Greek coast near a town that had been sacked by Turks. In a small hut near the burned village they discovered two survivors of the massacre in the shape of two children who were carefully wrapped up. One of them wore garments of fine quality and upon them was embroidered the name "Colvocoresses". The children were brought to America and the aristocratic little Greek was adopted by the captain of the cruiser and taken to Vermont. Every effort was made by the child's foster parents to discover his friends or relatives but without success. He entered the navy and rose to the rank of captain. He married from the District of Lake Michigan is a most a Vermont girl. His record reads "George P. Colvocoresses, born in Greece, appointed from Vermont February 21, 1832." In 1872 he died, named after his father and like him became a captain in the United States Navy. He was assigned to the Lancaster upon his graduation from Annapolis in 1869. Since then he has held many responsible positions and at last returns to the Lancaster as its commanding officer.

The name of Madame Tsilka has become a familiar term through the interest in the capture and ransom of Miss Stone, the missionary. The details of the life of her companion in bondage, Madame Tsilka, are most interesting. She is the wife of a Bulgarian although a Macedonian by birth. Her full life story would make a highly thrilling sensational novel. Her father was a Greek priest in a little village of Macedonia but was an unusually intelligent man. In the next village was a school taught by a teacher who had been trained in one of the American missions. Girls as well as boys were admitted to the school but all members of the established Greek church were forbidden to send their children to this school therefore the father of little Katherine as a priest was doubly obligated not to seek admission to the school for his little girl. Alone she sought the school and stood outside until the teacher asked her to enter. Her father was alarmed both for her safety and his own when he learned that she was a student at the foreign school, but with rare firmness the child of eight declared she should die unless allowed to continue at the school. For five years she studied and then at the age of thirteen her father arranged a marriage for her. She had not been consulted as to her choice as this was not the custom but much to her parents' surprise the bride was found to be missing. When her hiding place was revealed, it was found that she refused the marriage with the same firmness with which as a child of eight she had refused to give up attending school. Her parents yielded for the second time, and the brave little Balkan maiden at last graduated with high honors from the American college at Samakov. She did not yet feel fitted for the work she planned to do and with little money but high courage she sailed for New York. Here she found interested and influential friends and the celebrated Moody took her to his famous Northfield school where she had a two years' course followed by a study of kindergarten methods in New York. She was planning to fit herself for general and useful work in Hacedonia. She knew that within a radius of thirty villages there was neither physician nor trained nurse. She entered the school for nurses of the New York Presbyterian hospital and after graduation entered upon the practice of her profession until she could earn money enough to return to Turkey, there to work among her own people. When about to sail she was called upon to nurse a dear friend who was ill in the Adirondacks. Here she met and married a young physician who was a native of her own Macedonia. In 1900 she returned to Turkey with her husband and commenced her missionary work of teaching nursing and healing the sick. She went to join Miss Stone on a tour when they were kidnapped by brigands. Their captivity since then has excited the interest and sympathy of all the world and the machinery of two governments has been at work to secure their release.

Millions have become so ordinary an affair that their mere possession does not make their owner famous. The time was in America when the millionaire was pointed out as a man of note for no other reason than that he possessed wealth. The name of Astor has been famous for four generations as a synonym for wealth. Colonel John Jacob Astor is of the fourth generation, but his claims to distinction do not rest upon his name alone. It is thirteen years since he graduated from Harvard. His classmates and friends at the famous old university had learned to respect the remarkable imagination that made his articles in the college papers peculiar and interesting. Some years after his graduation Colonel Astor published A Journey to Other Worlds, an account of a trip to Mars. The book proved popular with the general public is about two hundred acres that has been filled try which had adopted him. His son was and was much discussed, as it told in a brilliant and forceful manner what we might expect to find upon that planet which many astronomers believe to be inhabited. There was enough of a scientific tone to the book to make it come within the limit of possibility. The same great imaginative faculty later led Colonel Astor into the field of invention. He secured a patent upon a pneumatic road sweeper and improver and later upon a bicycle brake. John Jacob Astor has an intense patriotic interest in public affairs but has never been a candidate for public office, although others have tried to induce him to enter the field. His title of Colonel came first from an appointment on Governor Morton's staff. When the Spanish American war broke out, Colonel Astor equipped a mountain battery and presented it to the government. In May, 1898, he was commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel of Volunteers and saw active service in the operations about Santiago, where he was present at the surrender. Colonel Astor married a beautiful Philadelphia girl, Miss Willing. She is a leader in the inner circle of New York's four hundred, where she is famed for her beauty and exquisite taste. Colonel Astor is kept busy with the management of his vast estate, but in addition he is on the board of directors of no less than six banks and three railroads.

You know the value of pasture for any kind of stock; how it keeps the animals in good condition—nature's own way of doing it. There is no argument about the value of the pasture, but it does not last the year 'round. Nature fixes up things for us only part of the time in anything. It is a part of her wise plan to leave us to our own human resources the rest of the time. But she always leaves us a way and the wherewithal to do nearly everything she does if we only find it out. We simply make the common-sense proposition that we prepare a Food, which, mixed with grain and fed to stock, furnishes in stall or feed box in the proper proportions the ingredients of pasture diet, hog or sheep, and a proportionately larger one for the owner of thousands of heads.

You know when the pasture goes down in the proper way when the pasture goes down in the proper way when the pasture goes down in the proper way when the pasture goes down in the proper propers.

hog or sheep, and a proportionately larger one for the owner of the FOR HOGS Hogs, you know, are the most susceptible of animals to contagious disease. But stock. There is either "make" or "break" in raising hogs. If you keep your hogs healthy they can resist contagion, will fatten quickly and cheaply. If they get sick and refuse to eat you know how quickly they die. Nothing will save them. Medicine is useless. Tokeep them healthy you must feed them something they will eat, and something that will satisfy the demands of their system. We believe there is only one thing in the world that will do this, and that is Wilbur's Food. It is not a medicine; it is a pure food made from pure barks, roots and seeds. Hogs like it, and hundreds of hog raisers say it is the only thing they can feed which proves satisfactory. Every hog that eats its will improve at once. If fed for thirty days the hog will be in perfectly healthy condition and fatten fast and cheaply.

FOR HORSES The demands of their system make them cat with relish the barks, roots and leaves of the pasture, and when they are out at pasture, getting them regularly, they are in perfect health. When you take them off pasture, unless you provide a good substitute, you deprive them of what nature desires them to have. You can supply this want by feeding Wilbur's Food and at the same time work or drive them every day. One ounce of Wilbur's Food in grain every day will put and keep your horses in good condition.

FOR COWS You know when the pasture goes down in the FOR COWS Fall the milk goes, the butter goes, the flavor goes, until all are shortest when the price is highest. Wilbur's Food invigorates cows; it supplies the needed roots, barks and leaves of the pasture, sustains the flow of milk and color, quantity and flavor of the butter. Take a cow right off the pasture, feed her Wilbur's Food in the stall, and she will show very little loss of milk, and one cent's worth of Food per day saves one dollar's worth of grain per month.

FOR STEERS AND CALVES One ounce of Wilbur's Food fed with grain to flesh on them and save you money on grain. A healthy animal wastes no food; it is all transformed into flesh. For calves you are raising, or ones you are fattening for real, you can obtain the most wonderful results by using one half measure of Wilbur's Food mixed with one pint of ground oats or corn meal.

FOR POULTRY Wilbur's Food makes hens lay more and better eggs, keeps them in better condition, and produces better market poultry.

I have been using Wilbur's Food for some time, and my horses are looking and doing better. At the same time I have cut down their usual allowance of feed. Where I was feeding 4 quarts oats. I am now feeding 3 quarts, and the horses never looked or felt better since I have owned them.

Regarding the value of Wilbur's Food would say that we have used it in our stable and find our stock is greatly improved in the using of it. We have tried several kinds of horse foods, but find that Wilbur's Food gives the best satisfaction and is as reasonable in price as any other, if not more so. We send you another order for 100 lbs.

Regarding Wilbur's Food, I will say that I have used different kinds of stock food but consider Wilbur's Food the best and cheapest because my horses look and feel batter when fed on it than they do on any other kind I have tried.

My hogs were stricken with the hog cholera, and after losing thirty-five I began using Wilbur's Food. I have not lost any since and they have all entirely recovered. I am sure if I had used Wilbur's Food on week sooner I would not have lost any. T. J. PARKS, Fullerton, Neb.

My drove of forty-eight hogs were all badly affected with some hog disease, supposed to be hog cholera. Your Wilbur's Food being highly recommended to me, I commenced feeding, and have continued now for two months. Every hog is in good condition and I am perfectly satisfied with the goods, as my loss was very little compared with the condition of my hogs when commencing to feed.

WILBUR'S FOOD

It makes animals fat, sleck and healthy. Prevents disease, keeps the blood cool, bowels loose and water clear. Use Wilbur's Food once every day and you will keep your horses' stomachs soft and sweet, and in a healthy condition. They will require less grain and are always ready for work. Use Wilbur's Food for cows running down on their milk and out of condition. It increases the flow of milk and improves the quality.

My hogs were affected with some hog disease about September 1, and I commenced using Wilbur's Hog Food strictly according to directions. My hogs are now all in a fine, healthy condition, and I can cheerfully recommend Wilbur's Food as a reliable food, not only for fattening hogs, but as a preventative for hog diseases, BARNEY KLAASEN, David City, Neb.

Having lost nearly all my hogs every year for the past three years with some hog disease, and my hogs being in a bad condition this fall. I concluded to try your Wilbur's Food, and I have been feeding the same for the past two months. I have not lost any hogs, and they today are all in fine condition. Will cheerfully recommend Wilbur's Food to all hog-raisers as a preventative for hog diseases.

E have the privilege of reading the palm of the distinguished actress, Julia Marlowe, this month. Her life story is plainly written in her palm. We see therein all the causes for her success, for the shape of her palm alone gives the keynote to her success in life, in some field of artistic endeavor—without doubt the stage. Perseverance, the faculty for dealing with imaginative things in a practical manner, the realization that genius, no matter how great, must be developed, fingers denoting highly acute intuitive faculties combined with inspirational qualities that tip the gray technique of labor with the golden gleam of inborn talent—all these facts are clearly indicated at a glance. She is quick to grasp the entire effect, but possesses the requisite capacity for detail to make possible the working out of a perfect whole.

iron will and her capacity for determined effort.

The life line tells of an illness in the past, one of a severe nature, and evidences a constitution that explains how she recuperates in a seemingly marvelous manner from exhausting mental and physical labor.

She will live to a good old age, too, and the latter part of her life will be both happy and

"Mrs. M. C. T." has a very strongly-marked hand also, and one that makes for success at last. She has a wonderful fate line, and that is the best line there is. Both that and the life line show that she was very much bound down to the wishes and caprices of others during the first part of her life and that she did not marry the right man. But after the age of 40 to 43 there will be a decided change for the better. She is exceedingly nervous and inclined to magnify her troubles by brooding over them. At the same time she has a great deal of courage and energy and will not despair. She will bear her burdens until she is convinced that her duty to others demands that she lay them down. She will be a good mother and a faithful, if not loving wife. I think she will move away from her present home in a year or two and that comfort and a change for the better will result. If she were to go into business for herself she would succeed, for she has a splendid hand and with that fate line could hardly fail if she tried. She needs to learn a little more of the art of cheerfulness and patience. She has an unusual quantity of worry lines, but these grow much less numerous after the age of 40, indicating a beneficent change then. Long life and fairly good health are indicated. I think there will be a second marriage at the age of 55 or near it, that will result happily. There are good signs of travel with good luck attending. She has excellent taste but is inclined too much toward melancholy and depression if left to herself. She needs to brace up and have more courage and more confidence in her future.

Some one asks about the meaning of the thumb in palmistry.

"The thumb in its indication is regarded in India as supreme. With gypsies the thumb is the first thing they look at on seeing a stranger. the first thing they look at on seeing a stranger. In Christian rites and ceremonies it is used to represent God, the Episcopal blessing being given with the thumb and two first fingers only, the three representing the Trinity. In medical science a 'thumb-center' is recognized in the brain, and any delicacy or pressure on this center in the brain is indicated in the thumb before it has made itself otherwise visible. the thumb plays a most important part in the science of cheirosophy; you may take it, as a rule, that a small, ill-formed, feeble, or badly-developed thumb indicates vaciliation of mind, irresolution and want of decision in affairs which require to be governed by reason rather than by instinct or by sentiment.

If the shortness of the second phalanx (logic) shows want of reasoning power; pointed fingers, a weak line of the head declining upon a high Mount of the Moon, and forked at its extremity, all give unfailing indications of a foolish-mindedness that cannot be counteracted even by a well-developed phalanx of will, or a well-formed line of fortune.

Small-thumbed subjects are governed rather by heart, as opposed to large-thumbed subjects, who are governed by the head; the former have more ideas than sentiment.

The bad indications (i. e., the weakness) of a small thumb may be counteracted by a high Mount or Plain of Mars, which will give firmness and decision to the character, as well as calmness and resignation. Another modifying sign is softness of the hand, (i. e., taziness), for in this case the subject will not take the trouble to get into mischief, (though he lacks the strength of will to resist temptation when it comes in his way).

With a large thumb, you will be independent and self-reliant, inclining rather to despotism, governing by will rather than by persuasion; with a small one, you will be reliant on others, easily governed, and wanting in self-confidence, but will possess, if your fingers be smooth, (no matter what their termination), the instincts, the natural tendencies, (undeveloped though they may be), of art.

So in the same way, he who is poetic or artistic by reason of his smooth, conic fingers, the more certainly so if he have a small thumb; while he who is exact and scientific by reason of his square or knotted fingers, will be more so if he have also a large thumb.

The greatest difficulty in the management of an aviary is the food question. Pelicans and berons, for example, require a diet of fresh fish. Flamingoes, too, are hard to suit in this matter. Cormorants, of course, are fish-eaters. It often happens, however, that birds used to a certain kind of provender can be persuaded to get along on something very different and more readily obtainable.

An illustration of this last remark is afforded by insect-eating birds, most of which are satisfied with finely-chopped beefsteak. The scarlet tanager and various small warblers are cases in point. When meet is not good enough for them, meal-worms are pretty sure to serve, and these are always obtainable in unlimited quantities. All that is necessary is to put a few meal-worms into some grain, and they will propagate almost ad infinitum. Owls thrive on beefsteak, but are the better for an occasional mouse.

HE golf vest, so called from its origin as part of the costume of the woman golfer, has come to be an important part of the wardrobe of every woman who is obliged to be out in all kinds of weather. It is comfortable as well as natty, and worn with a medium weight jacket or raglan gives sufficient warmth without the extra weight of a heavy garment made of cloth thick enough to keep one warm. These vests are made of knitted woolen material, usually, though there are also those made from heavy felting and broadcloth. They come in black with white spots, navy blue and red with white spots, also the plain colors. The red ones are particularly popular. The cost of these vests is from four to six dollars, but one could be made for much less by a woman with any sort of an idea of how to cut, fit and finish a garment. Our illustration shows the general style. They are double-breasted, fastened with two rows of brass buttons, and bound around the entire vest, armholes and all, with a bias piece of silk to match the color, stitched on. Pockets add to the attractiveness of the garment, but unless one is really an exceptional sewer one should not attempt to put them in, as they are difficult to do and if not done perfectly would spoil the effect of the whole vest. The double-faced cloth used for golf skirts is good for vests, as the wrong side is usually of bright plaid and gives a pretty finish. This cloth is so wide that only the length of the vest need be bought, probably half a yard.

Fancy embroidered turn over collars are having a tremendous vogue. We have had the white hemstitched and lace-trimmed turn overs for some time, but the present fad is entirely different, as heavy canvas in colors is used, embroidered in scallops and dots in a variety of colors of silk. A suggestion for making a child's ball comes from one of our readers and probably will be just what "E S. L." asked for instructions for making, sometime ago.

Find a pillbox—a tin one is best—and put in it a dozen shot to make a noise. Make a bag of white muslin or cambric the size of a big ball and fill with cotton wool, putting the pillbox in the middle before sewing the end up. For the outside choose very gay colored wools in five colors. On the ordinary steel knitting needles cast on 18 stitches and knit 30 rows. Sew the strips together and slip the muslin ball inside, drawing each end close and fastening it securely. The rattling noise it makes will be much enjoyed by the youngster.

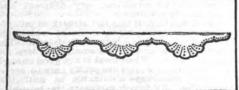

At various times we have had requests for a recipe for making a good waterproof blacking, and have finally found one which we hope will prove satisfactory.

Mix one part borax with eighteen parts melted beeswax and stir to a stiff jelly. Then mix five parts oil of turpentine with six parts melted spermacetti. Combine mixtures, and the result will be nearly colorless paste, excellent to use on natural leather.

Candlemas Day be fair and bright, Winter will have another flight."

flight."
For hundreds of years, now, people who live in cold countries have repeated the above couplet or some version of the belief which is set forth in it, and have watched with more or less confidence in its truth, to see what kind of weather the morning of February 2nd ushered in.

In New England the farmers say:

"Candlemas Day. Candlemas Day.
Half your corn and half your hay."

Then on the second day of February they make a mental inventory of the contents of their barns and corn cribs, to see whether they can add another cow and hog to the barn yard's live stock, or whether their stock already on hand must be put on short rations for the rest of the season. of the season.

In far northern New England and in Canada, where bears are yet not uncommon, it is believed that Bruin, who has been hibernating through the winter in some cave or hollow log, comes out for the first time on Candlemas Day. If he can see his shadow on the snow—that is, if the day is "clear and bright"—he goes back into his den and curls up for another long sleep. If, however, the day is so cloudy that no shadow falls beside him, he knows that spring will come so early that he stays out and begins the year's campaign then and there.

In Scotland the form of the weather maxim is: In far northern New England and in Canada

"If Candlemas is fair and clear, There'll be twa winters in the year."

"If Candlemas is fair and clear, There'll be twa winters in the year."

Unlike Easter, Candlemas is one of the fixed feasts of the church, and always comes on February 2. It is celebrated with great pomp by the Catholic Church, and is recognized by the Church of England, the Lutheran Church, and by the Episcopal Church in this country. Formal celebration of it was given up in the English Church a long time ago. Some of the Lutheran churches keep the festival and some do not. The day commemorates the presentation of the infant Christ in the Temple forty days after his birth, and is sometimes called St. Simeon's Day, on account of Simeon's words, "A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of my people, Israel." In England it used to be called "Wives' Feast Day." In Scotland it is one of the four "term" days appointed for periodical annual payment of money, interest, taxes, etc. The other days are Whit-Sunday, May 15, Lammas, August 1, Martinmas, November 11.

The name of Candlemas comes from the fact

The festival is probably much older than the Catholic Church itself, and is a survival of an old Roman custom, the story of which will old Roman custom, the story of which will interest young people who are just studying their Latin mythology. The Romans devoted the month of February to the infernal deities, because they believed that it was at the beginning of this month that Pluto had stolen Proserpine away from the world. They believed that Ceres, the mother of Proserpine, had sought her daughter through Sicily for a whole night, looking for her with the help of torches kindled at the volcano of Mt. Aetna. The festival of St. Agatha is still kept in Sicily, beginning on Candlemas Day, and the procession of wax tapers is sometimes varied with an out-door procession of men carrying pine torches which are kindled near the spot where Ceres was supposed to have lighted hers. In Ceres was supposed to have lighted hers. In commemoration of Ceres the Romans held torch light processions every year. The fathers of the early church found the custom so strongly established that they decided not to do away with it, but instead transferred its ob-ject from Ceres to the Madonna, and as such it has remained.

One of the sweetest of Keeble's hymns was written for this day, the one in which occur the stanzas:

"Blessed are the pure in heart,
For they shall see our God;
The secret of the Lord is theirs,
Their soul is Christ's abode.

Might mortal thought presume To guess an angel's lay, Such are the notes that echo through The courts of heaven today."

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by, when Oklahoma vast he objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more exciting manner.

Because of the exciting events that have transpired in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, events that have attracted the attention of the whole country, the story of "Ned Todd" is presented to our readers in the hope that instruction and entertainment may be derived from its perusal.

CHAPTER I.

THE TRAVELERS AND THEIR MISSION.

THE TRAVELERS AND THEIR MISSION.

Half way between the Canadian and Red rivers, is that much-talked-of country Oklahoma. Long before its broad acres were opened for settlement, when the Indian and the coyote roamed its prairies at will, two horsemen, followed by a pair of pack mules, were leisurely riding along, at the same time exercising that watchful care so necessary of observance in the wilderness. Oklahoma, in the days of which we write, was the Indian's name for the "Beautiful lands," and late developments in that now prosperous and thriving territory prove that the title was well deserved.

The soil is deep and fertile, and covered with

The soil is deep and fertile, and covered with a dense forest, or rolling prairies. The country is watered by hundreds of small streams, which are tributaries of Red river, or the Canadian.

One of the horsemen was about forty-five years of age, though his bronzed face and long white hair gave him the appearance of being much older. His companion was a youth of not over two and twenty. Both were attired in the costume essential to western travel. They wore the soft, broad-brimmed hats, the heavy riding boots, and coarse garb so essential to the plains man. Each was armed with a repeating rifle, a knife and a brace of revolvers.

a repeating rifle, a knife and a brace of revolvers.

The faces of both were stern and grave, and the young man's in addition, denoted fatigue. He was evidently unaccustomed to roughing it, in the wild West. His hands were too soft and his complexion too clear, for him to have been long on the frontier, yet his bright blue eye was bold, and his nerves as steady as if he had led a life of danger.

"We must be far from civilization now, Ned," said the youth in a voice which he designed to be cheerful.

"Yes, we are in the midst of the country called Oklahoma," his companion answered.

"Beautiful,—beautiful land indeed. Why Ned, this is a veritable paradise."

"It is indeed lovely."

"Have you ever been here before?"

"Yes, I have been through the country a number of times. Three times I have guided the troops in here, to drive out the white settlers."

"It seems wrong that the poor white people settlers."

"It seems wrong that the poor white people cannot live in this beautiful country."
Ned merely sighed and bowed his iron-grey head. It was for the courts, and the interior department at Washington to decide and not for him to bother himself about. The man whom the youth called Ned, was Major Edward Todd, who had earned a national reputation, as a guide, western detective and ranger. At one time he was a major in a regiment of Texas rangers, and since then he employed his time in ferreting out criminals who infested the Indian Territory. dian Territory.

For a few moments, the horsemen rode along the narrow wood path in silence, while their pack mules with their heavy burdens jogged along in their rear. At last the younger man, whose name was Archie Holland, with a sigh,

"Ned, do you think that we will find him?"
"Your father?" asked the detective in a manner which indicated that the subject was not a new one to him.
"Yes."

"Yes."
"I have a strong hope. Can you put any reliance in Frank Erwin?"
"It was his dying confession."
"Was he sane?"
"He was. He was mortally wounded in a saloon fight and carried to the hospital. Knowing that I was in the city he sent for me and ing that I was in the city, he sent for me, and told me that my father who has been missing for ten years, and who was supposed to have been murdered by the Indians while on his ranch in Texas, was here in Oklahoma a pris-

"It is strange that your latner should be kept a prisoner for ten years."
"There is a mystery attached to it which I cannot understand. Having full confidence in your ability to ferret out such things, I employed you for that purpose. I shall depend altogether on your judgment, Major."
Major Todd was silently chewing his quid of tobacco, while his keen eyes wandered through the woods. They were surrounded by danger on every hand, and he knew that their venture might terminate at any moment in the death of himself, or his employer, or both.

Archie Holland's father had been a very wealthy stock dealer, who had numerous ranches in Texas, and all along the frontier.

Archie was his only son and heir. His mother had been married before she married Mr. Holland, and had a son by her former husband. Ralph Spencer was twelve years older band. Raiph Spencer was tweive years order than his half brother, whom he despised. He had gone out west to care for one of his step-father's ranches, and finally ran away, and was not heard from any more. Archie Holland's mother was dead, and there was nothing now to hinder him from following the bent of his inclinations. inclinations.

He determined to unravel the mystery con-cerning his father's fate, or lose his life in the effort.

"Archie," said his companion, in a cautious undertone, "do you think that you can stand

"Yes," the young fellow answered, fixing his clear blue eyes in astonishment on the face of his interlocutor. "Why do you ask?" "Because we are in imminent peril."
"From Boomers?"

"From Boomers?"

"No, no, the boomers are several miles from here, but if I am not very much mistaken we are in the district infested by Captain Snell."

"Captain Snell, who is he? A Boomer?"

"No, worse than that."

"Explain yourself, Ned, I never heard of this man Captain Snell before."

"He is well known to record a clong the bore."

"He is well known to people along the border. He is an outlaw. A road agent."
"A robber?"

"Yes."
"Well, he has certainly chosen a place where he can do mankind but little harm."
"You are mistaken. He has about him a band of horse thieves and desperadoes, white renegades, Indians, and negroes. They steal horses, rob wagon trains, ranches and even pillage villages, always seeking safety from pursuit in this vast wilderness, and neutral ground, where they have not yet been successfully pursued."
"Major," said the youth. He sometimes called the detective Major, and sometimes fully pursued."

"Major," said the youth. He sometimes called the detective Major, and sometimes Ned.
"What were you about to say?" asked Ned?

nave in my mind connected him with it, since I first heard your story," the ranger detective answered. "But it would be wholly unlike Snell to spare the life of a prisoner. He prefers killing, as dead men tell no tales."

"Hark!" "I have in my mind connected him with it,

There was a crashing sound in the woods on their left. Before the Major could comprehend what Archie was about, the young fellow had slipped from his horse, and with rifle in hand plunged into the thicket. He was gone but a moment when the sharp stunning report of a rifle filled the woods with reverberating sechoes. echoes.

echoes.

"Confusion!" cried the ranger springing from his horse and cocking his gun. "The boy is as rash as boys always are. It may be some redskin drawing him into an ambuscade."

The ranger knew that was Archie's rifle that he heard. He also knew that he was giving something a close chase through the woods, for he could hear the loud tramp of feet. A few moments later the youth reappeared rifle in hand. in hand.

"What was it?" asked the ranger.
"I don't know what it was," Archie answered shaking his head mysteriously.
"You don't? Did you not shoot at it?"
"Oh yes, I shot at something like a man, as it ran away, and then it seemed to all at once change to a parther and next to a horse and it ran away, and then it seemed to all at once change to a panther, and next to a horse, and it galloped away."

"Did you see the horse?"
"No, but I heard the horse's feet, just as plain as I ever heard anything. I tell you, Major, there must be something supernatural about it."
The ranger smiled. To him it was all very clear. After a few moments lost in listening

"Yes, it was an Indian with a panther's skin wrapped around him. He had a horse concealed in the bushes, and ran away to him. It is a wonder that he did not send a bullet or an arrow into you."
"But I thought that there were no Indians here."

"But I thought that there were no Indians here."

"This they claim for their reservation."

"Are not all the Indians here friendly?"

"Yes, or supposed to be. There are hundreds of them, though, who will not hesitate to send a shot into a traveler, if they think they will not be discovered in the act."

They were riding down the path which at this point became a narrow rocky defile, with bluffs and tall trees on either side. The youth felt his nerves tingle with excitement, and clutching his rifle nervously, his eyes searched the woods about him.

Suddenly a wild unearthly shriek rent the air, and from the bluff above on their right, are thurdering a burge stone weighing the "Back! back!" cried the frontier detective, wheeling his horse about so suddenly, that he struck the horse on which Archie was riding, and almost unseated him. Both horses got out mass of rock which struck into the bed of the ravine with a thundering shock. Small frag-ments of stone were scattered over the two

They glanced up to the bluff above from whence the stone had fallen, but no sign of any one could be seen. It was certainly very mysterious.

"Ned," said the youth, "do you understand it?"

"Everything, but that warning cry," answered the border detective leaping from his horse, and with his rifle in his hand running up the steep rocky hillside with the agility of a mountain sheep. But a few moments later he returned, his face wearing a still more puzzled look.

"Moior what did you see?" asked the youth puzzied look.

"Major, what did you see?" asked the youth.

"Nothing after I got up there."

"Did you see anything before you went?"

"Yes, if my eyes did not deceive me, and they never have, I saw the face of an Indian in war paint."

"Impossible, what become of """

"Impossible, what became of it?"
"That's what puzzles me most. I can't say what became of it," answered the ranger shaking his head very mysteriously. "It is gone, whatever it was. There were two of them, one a friend and one a foe."
"How do you know?"

"How do you know?"

"The warning _cry was from a friend, the mass of stone a toe. When a redskin decides to kill anyone, he does not give him warning in advance."

in advance."
"I had not thought of that."

"You must think of everything here."

"I believe you."

"I believe you."
They rode unmolested down the narrow rocky defile which seemed wedged in between two hills. It was undoubtedly the bed of a stream that was dry at certain seasons of the year. At last they came to a level bottom, covered with oak, pecan, hackberry and various other kinds of trees common to this country.

While gazing about among the cool dark aisles, the youth suddenly caught a glimpse of an object, which suddenly flitted behind a giant oak.

"Look, Major, look," he cried wheeling his horse about toward the tree.

"What do you see?" the ranger asked.

"A head; a feather, see!"

A white puff of smoke curled up from the distant tree, and the next moment a rifle bullet came whistling through the air, piercing the broad brim of the Major's hat.

In an instant both horsemen had clapped spurs to their horses, and were thundering away into the woods after the would-be assassin, like a brace of thunderbolts. They reached the tree while the smoke hung still like a faint cloud upon the air, and was fading like a faint cloud upon the air, and was fading away among the woods.

But not a sign of the would-be assassin was to be seen. They searched diligently, but without avail. The ranger detective dismounted and examined the earth for some sign of the trail, but it could not be found. This led him to believe that the rascal was in the tree, but a careful examination proved that he was not, and they once more returned to the path which they had been traveling.

to the path which they had been traveling.

The ranger detective was silent, while his brow was gathered into a knot of wrinkles, and it was apparent to the youth, that he had met a mystery that he was incapable of solving. They came to a creek, the water of which was so deep as to come quite up to the bodies of their horses.
"Look there, Major," said the youth draw-

"Where id it going?"

"Where did it come from?" said the Major.
"I will ride back and see," said Archie Holland. He had wheeled his horse about, when land. He had wheeled his horse about, when suddenly a sharp cry farther ahead, arrested his attention.

"There it is again,—that warning voice. What is it?" cried the ranger for the first time showing some degree of excitement.

With his horse's forefeet in the stream, Archie had paused and was looking back at the detective as if to ask what he should do. Another shrill, unearthly shriek in the dark woods ahead attended by the shouts of men's voices, was borne to their ears. Major Todd could retain himself no longer.

"Come on, come on, there's trouble ahead and we have no time to lose!" he cried.

horses.

Suddenly the sharp report of a pistol rang out on the air. It was followed by a cry of pain, and two or three more shots in quick succession. Loud angry voices, and the clash of arms, made it evident that a conflict was raging in that dark old wood.

"Has some one been attacked by Indians?" asked Archie, as they thundered along the path.

"More likely, it's Captain Snell's gang," an-

"More likely, it's Captain Snell's gang," answered the major.
The sounds of conflict were receding, and mingled with them was the rattle of carriage or wagon wheels. There was a crash at last, followed by a double report, and the shriek of a female rose on the air.

"It's a woman, Major, Heaven help her!" groaned the youth.

"Let's help her ourselves," cried the border ranger, as he spurred his horse onward, cocking his rifle and holding the bridle rein in his teeth.

The horsemen did not see the grape vine that was stretched across the path, until it struck both of them at the waists, and sent them whirling to the ground. Their rifles were dis-charged in the air, and their horses fled into the woods.

CHAPTER II.

SIGNS AND ADVENTURES.

Neither Archie nor the ranger were injured Neither Archie nor the ranger were injured beyond a few trifling bruises by the fall. In a moment both were on their feet trying to recall their horses, which had stopped a few rods away, and stood uneasily sniffing the air."

After some little delay they caught them, and slipping a couple of cartridges in their guns, again vaulted in their saddles.

"They're not far," said the youth.

"Yes, but it is all over," his companion returned.

Strange to say not a single sound of conflict had been borne to their ears after they had been thrown from their horses. They rode more carefully, yet at considerable speed. When they had gone about two hundred yards, they came upon a dark form lying at down her back, almost to the belt about her the roadside. It was a man either dead or waist.

Archie Holland threw himself from his horse, and raised him to a half-sitting position. He now noticed that he was about fifty tion. He now noticed that he was about fity years of age, his head was quite bald, his beard long and gray. A few feet further away lay a dead horse and the wreck of a buggy. "Who did this? Speak quick," cried Archie realizing that the stranger's moments on earth

"Captain Snell, and his cut throats," was the answer in a very feeble voice, for the blood was welling up from a wound in his breast. "Who are you, and where are you going?" asked the detective, who at this moment had asked the detective, who at this moment had come to the dying man's side.

"I am Randolph Miller, and was going to the Boomers' camp on Calvary Creek, with my daughter. The villians came on me and shot me and carried her away."

His deathly pale face, and the contortions of his features showed that he was suffering extreme agony. But his mental agony for the loss of his daughter was far greater than his physical suffering. Although it cost him a great effort he continued: physical suffering. Although it cost him a great effort he continued:
"If you are men with hearts in your bosoms, if you ever had any sympathy for a stricken man, oh, rescue her! Death is better than captivity with such monsters! Save, oh, save my Daisy!"

Archiv Holland was so deeply impressed by Archie Holland was so deeply impressed by the appeal of the dying man, that there upon his knee, holding the hand that was growing stiff in death, he swore that Daisy Miller should be found and rescued from her captors or he would perish in the effort.

The detective reminded him that he already had one object to accomplish, but he paid no heed to him. Youth is quick, impulsive, and not likely to listen to reason.

A few gasps and the man who had given his life in defense of his child, was dead.

"He is gone," said Archie, rising to his feet.

"We must bury him before we proceed further," said the detective. "Wild animals would devour the body, before we could return

The mules had by this time come up, and from one pack they took an axe and, with their knives they soon hollowed out a shallow grave.

knives they soon hollowed out a shallow grave. In this they put the body, and covered it up with earth and stones.

"Now Major," said Archie solemnly, "we have a new obligation upon us. The young lady must be found."

"I am very much afraid young man, that you are putting so much upon our shoulders, that we shall not succeed with any of it."

"But this was a very solemn obligation," said the youth, thoughtfully. "Who could refuse the dying man such a request? Not I. I swore to him that I would rescue his daughter and I will."

They mounted their horses and with their

and I will."

They mounted their horses and with their pack mules following, rode away. What had become of the outlaws and how many of them were they? were questions that constantly occurred to both travelers. The noon-day sun was high in the heavens, and with the exciting events of the morning, both the travelers had grown quite hungry. They had sufficient provision to last them several days. Todd, understanding the youth, asked him if he did not think it almost time to feed.

"I believe it is," he answered. "At least, I

"I believe it is," he answered. "At least, I feel that way."

"There is an open spot about half a mile further on where we can halt and cook our dinners, while the horses graze."

They rode to the spot, which was near a spring of clear cold water.

"What a delightful country," said young Holland dismounting, and gazing in admiration on the wild picturesque scenery which surrounded them. The country was indeed possessed of a wild, strange beauty, calculated to charm the beholder and at the same time inspire him with awe.

spire him with awe.
The detective gathered up a few armfuls of ry wood and started a fire. Archie was not the boy to play the fine gentleman, and ren-dered all the assistance he could. Having been but a few days on the frontier he was not yet proficient in camp duties. The horses were picketed out to graze in the narrow valley, near the camp.

picketed out to graze in the narrow valley, near the camp.

Dinner was almost ready. The Major was squatting at the fire with a piece of venison on the point of a sharp stick, holding it over the coals, when again that warning cry was heard from the bluff above. Before he could turn his head, or even rise from where he sat, there came a loud report from the bluff above, and an ounce ball whizzing past the Major's cheek struck the venison steak from the stick, and sent the ashes flying in every direction.

The startled frontiersman sprang to his rifle, but his young companion was ahead of him.

The startled frontiersman sprang to his rifle, but his young companion was ahead of him, and three shots rang out in quick succession from his repeating Winchester rifle. Before the smoke had blown from the spot where Archie stood, he was half way up the steep hillside, tearing along over the rocks and bushes, regardless of the scratches and bruises. In fifteen minutes he was back to find the frontiersman putting the finishing touches to the dinner.

"You've been gone so long that dinner has almost got cold," said Ned Todd quietly.
"I was trying to kill that infernal redskin or scoundrel, whoever or whatever he is."
"Well, did you succeed?"
"No—"

"I knew you would not. He is too shrewd to put himself in your way."
"But how does he manage to disappear as soon as he shoots? That's the question I would like to have answered."

"Just now it's a question that I am not able to answer, so let us eat our dinner and think the whole thing over afterwards."

While eating their venison steak and army bread their horses began to utter snorts of surprise or terror. The men grasped their rifles and wheeled about to meet an object that filled them with astonishment.

prise or terror. The men grasped their rifes and wheeled about to meet an object that filled them with astonishment.

Coming leisurely toward them was a woman. Her dark face and sharp black eyes were evidence that she had Indian blood in her veins. She wore a short skirt coming a little below the knee, and ornamented with a fringe of braided beads. Her jacket was made of the tanned skins of wild animals, elaborately and fantastically ornamented. A pair of close-fitting leggings covered her legs, and her small feet were encased in a pair of moccasins, the soles of which were made of the toughest bull's hide. Her slender waist was encircled by a belt in which was a brace of pistols and a dirk knife, while she carried a rifle in her hand. Her head was without covering save her abundant hair that was gathered back and held by a bright red ribbon, hanging in massive splenoor down her back, almost to the belt about her waist.

She was a being more calculated to excite curiosity than alarm in a romantic youth, like Archie Holland. Without evincing either fear or hostility toward the strangers, she adrefine Holland. Without evincing either fear or hostility toward the strangers, she advanced in a bold reckless manner, and in a voice of the clearest, purest English said: "Good-day, gentlemen."
"Good-day to you, be seated," said the Major.

With careless ease she threw herself upon the grass within a few feet of the travelers.
"Will you not have some dinner?" asked the "Will you not have some dinner?" asked the detective.

"No, I'm not hungry."
Archie fixed his eyes on the strange woman. Notwithstanding she was bronzed by long exposure to wind and weather, there were still left upon her face some traces of beauty. She was near thirty years of age, but about her large black eyes, there was a look of youthfulness.

Do you live about here?" asked the ranger.

"Do you live about here?" asked the ranger.
"No, I live up on Bender's Fork."
"Then you must be out hunting?"
"Yes, for men," she answered, with a strange laugh. The Major fixed his shrewd gray eyes on her for a moment in an enquiring manner. She met his gaze and after a moment said:
"Ned Todd, I thought you too smart to venture down here."
"I have businese"

"I have business."

"I know all about it, but I tell you it is impossible." (CONTINUED ON PAGE 19.)

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

HEN the average housewife is found lamenting over a "batch of poor bread," she is very apt to exclaim, "It must be the flour." But were she to visit the baking department of a large mill where fine patent flour is made, she would certainly look about for so me other agency of evil before she condemned her flour, provided of course she had used a brand of good quality. Probably she never dreamed that bread was baked in a flour mill, any more than she would expect washing to be done, or baths to be given in a soap factory,—but it is. On the upper floor of a big stone building in Minneapolis, in the midst of dozens of railroad tracks, and with the rumble and vibration of heavy machinery all about, is to be found the baking, or as it is technically termed, the testing department, of the largest flour mill in the world.

This department occupies three rooms, the office, the kitchen and the testing room, all as immaculately clean as the traditional Dutch kitchen is fitted out faultlessly with mixing table, shining tins and rising and baking ovens, and the perfection of every appliance for baking would fill the average housewife's heart with envy. The rising oven has three tiers of shelves, to each of which the heat may be ovens, and the perfection of every appliance for baking would fill the average housewife's heart with envy. The rising oven has three tiers of shelves, to each of which the heat may be turned on separately. The bottoms are fitted with small boards each of which accommodate a loaf. The doors are of glass. This rising oven maintains a perfectly even heat which is tested by means of a thermometer secured in the back of each tier. The baking ovens, for there are two, are of sheet iron, one round, the other square. These two are heated to an exact temperature for each baking. All the heat is supplied by electricity, and the baker has only to turn a knob and his fire is ready.

But of the actual work of testing the flour, that done in the testing room is to be inspected first. In this room is a miniature rolling mill, where samples of all newly received wheat are ground between rollers and bolted. The samples of what is thus ground are then subjected to the gluten test. For this a small portion of each is mixed with a given amount of water and then put in small pats on a glass slab. These are analyzed in order to ascertain the proportion of gluten and starch which each contains.

the proportion of gluten and starch which each contains. A report is made to the wheat men which enables them to determine where the best wheat is coming from, and accordingly where to buy.

An expert can judge of the quality of the wheat by the appearance of the pats on the glass. The dry color shows on top, shows on top, after it has stood for a time, and the moist color may be seen through the glass. If there is doubt about the strength of the gluten, a baking test is made. A small piece of the gluten dough is put into the bottom of a cylinder, and above it in the cylinder is placed a weight of eleven and one-half ounces. The cylinder,—there are four fitted into a sort of frame which keeps them upright,—is then placed in an oven heated to 600, and baked. The strength of the gluten is indicated by the height to which the weight above it is raised.

Besides the gluten test which is for the purpose of determining the quality of the wheat received, the flour itself is tested several times each day. Samples are taken from each one of the company's mills, usually five times during the twenty-four hours. These are subjected to the color test. This consists in mixing a given portion of each sample of flour with an exact proportion of water. The dough is then put in small pats on glass, and the dry and moist color of each is noted and compared with dough of standard grade. This is known and moist color of each is noted and compared and moist color of each is noted and compared with dough of standard grade. This is known as the "standard dough test," and enables the man who does the testing to locate at once any flavor which is falling below the standard. The samples are not taken at stated times, and the head miller never knows at what moment his flour may be taken to the testing room.

After the dough test, some of the flour from each mill is taken and baked into a loaf of bread. To the uninitiated this seems the most satisfactory test of all, since the proof of the bread, as well as the pudding, "is in the eating." When the loaves have been baked each ing." When the loaves have been based one is numbered, that the baker may know to which mill each loaf belongs, but the numbers are changed every day, so that the head millers never know which loaf is their own until after the test has been made.

The head miller of each mill goes to the test-ing room every day at a given hour to test the loaves. Each loaf is cut in two lengthwise and the millers in turn are required to grade the loaves in accordance with a standard grade. Sometimes the miller unknowingly condemns his own as falling below the standard, but the test is absolutely fair, and it has the effect of keeping the miller up to the mark as regards the flour his mill puts out.

And this is the prime object of all the testing, to keep the quality of all the flour put out by the company's mills up to the very highest

Each flour is measured in all its dimensions, weighed and color noted, and a complete re-port of the day's baking is sent to each man-ager and head miller, while a record is kept al-ager and head miller, while a record is kept also in the testing office.

After all the tests have been made, the remaining flour in each sample is put into a glass jar properly labeled with date, mill and shipment, and is kept for six months. This is done as a precaution against unjust claims for rebate. Sometimes after a merchant has bought a large consignment of flour, the wheat market drops, and in order that he may not lose on the deal he will claim a rebate, stating that the flour was not up to standard grade. The tester goes at once to his glass jars, picks out his sample of the flour that was sent, makes a loaf of bread from it and sends it to the complaining customer, asking what he considers wrong ing customer, asking what he considers wrong with it. It has proved a safe precaution, although one not often required to be brought into evidence.

The process and essential points of bread making as given by the baker of this mill will making as given by the baker of this mill will be of interest to every housewife. Every step of the bread making is done by rule, and there is no guesswork or "luck" in the process from start to finish. The exact time given to one batch of bread from the beginning of mixing to its withdrawal from the oven, is three hours. "The quicker the dough is off your hands, the better bread you will have," is the baker's way of putting it.

better bread you will have," is the baker's way of putting it.

In mixing the bread, every ingredient is weighed accurately, the flour, water, lard, compressed yeast, and even the sugar and salt. Then it is set to rise in the rising oven which is kept at a uniform temperature of eighty-five degrees. It will rise sufficiently in this oven in forty minutes, when it is taken out and worked down by hand. This process consists of pulling it apart over and over again instead of using the ordinary method of kneading. It is then set away again in the rising oven and left thirty minutes, after which it is worked in the same way and put into the baking tins. When it has nearly doubled its size again it is ready for the baking oven. This is kept at a temperature of four hundred degrees, and the loaves bake in another forty minutes, but they are somewhat smaller than the ordinary household loaf.

All the work is done by hand, while the bak-All the work is done by hand, while the baking is by electricity. Compressed yeast is used, but this is obtained in the dry state, as the moist yeast does not rise as rapidly. The ordinary dry yeast of the market does not, however, rise as fast as the compressed, even in its moist state. The lard used is real leaf lard, tried out in the kitchen, not the rendered lard of commerce.

the wheat are preserved. Another argument in favor of the white flour is its absolute cleantiness and freedom from all impurities and adulterations. This is not only due to the cleanliness of mills and machinery, but also to the necessary process of bolting. The germ is preserved in all other cereal foods, and this will in time cause the food to become unfit for will in time cause the food to become unit for use, and will in many cases cause fermentation after eating unless the stomach is very strong. So in spite of the latter day arguments which are aired on nearly every new cereal put upon the market, we may still feel safe in eating good wholesome bread and biscuit made from fine white flour.

We have been asked for the recipe for making the delicious little cakes which are universally made in Germany a few weeks before Christmas. These cakes are called springerlie, and we give recipe for making, also illustration of the mould.

Beat the yolks of four eggs until lightcolored and thick, the whites until dry, then beat together. Add the grated rind of a lemon, and beat in very gradually one pound of sifted powdered sugar. Lastly add one pound of flour, sifted with one-fourth teaspoonful of salt and a scant level teaspoonful of bakingpowder. Add the last of the flour cautiously, as all may not be required. Knead the dough, cover closely, and let chill two or three hours.
Then roll, a small piece at a time, into a sheet one-eighth an inch thick. With a very fine sieve dust the sheet of dough lightly with flour, then press the wooden mould down very hard upon the dough. Cut out the little squares with a knife and set aside, on a board lightly floured, over night. In the morning transfer to baking-tins, buttered and sprinkled with anise seed, and bake in a slow oven to a light straw-color.

N Paraguay oranges are found in great abundance, many of the trees growing wild. The fruit forms a staple article of diet for the poor people, especially for those who live in the country. A tree seven years old averages about 1000 oranges during the season, which extends from April to December, inclusive. The poorer oranges are fed to hogs kept by the farmers, and orange-fed pork is said to have a delicious flavor.

I Will Cure You of Rheumatism. No Pay Until You Know It.

After 2,000 experiments, I have learned how to cure Rheumatism. Not to turn bony joints into flesh again; that is impossible. But I can cure the disease always, at any stage, and forever.

I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal and I will send you an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure, for every druggist keeps it. Use it for a month, and if it does what I claim pay your druggist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't, I will pay him myself.

I have no samples. Any medicine that can affect Rheumatism with but a few doses must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs. It is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that, even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you. I know it and I take this risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay, and gladly. I have learned that people in general are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all I ask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Simply write me a postal card or letter. Let me send you an order for the medicine; also a book. Take it for a month, for it won't harm you anyway. If it cures pay $5.50. I leave that entirely to you. Address Dr. Shoop, Box 304, Racine, Wis.

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT

ERY elaborate were the preparations made by President and Mrs. Roosevelt for the bril-Roosevelt for the bril-liant ball which they gave at the White House in Washington, on the evening of Jan-uary third. Its suc-cess was especially gratifying to them for upon that occasion they formally present-ed their daughter Alice ed their daughter Alice to the social world of the Nation's Capital. and Navy officers were in full dress, the diplomats from foreign countries, many of whom hold high military rank, were gorgeous in the finest uniforms of the crack regiments of the Old World, and the costumes of the ladies in attendance were brilliant in the extreme.

Miss Roosevelt's gown was a model of simplicity. It was of white chiffon, embroidered in white roses, made with a train and falling in simple, graceful lines, well adapted to the splendid figure of the wearer. More than one thousand exquisite bouquets of flowers were received by her, and they were displayed on the six great mantlepieces of the East Room, and in their mass and delicate bloom were the principal features of the decorations.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, shows that there are 997,735 pensioners on the government rolls, and that during the year the enormous sum of $144,003,469.01 was expended in payment of pensions and the administration of the pension office. There are on the rolls the names of 715,657 soldiers who served in the Civil War, and also the names of 20,122 men who served in the navy of the United States during the same period.

There are upon the rolls the names of nine widows and daughters of revolutionary soldiers, and 1,528 of the widows and survivors of the war of 1812. The rates of pensions granted range from $100 per month down to $6 per month. Not only is a pension granted to a soldier, but to his widow, minor children and dependent relatives, under certain prescribed legal restrictions. The Emperor of Germany has invited the President's daughter, Alice, to christen his new yacht, which he has had built in this country, and the distinguished honor has been accepted in her behalf by President Roosevelt. Prince Henry of Germany, the Kaiser's younger brother, has been selected to represent the German Emperor at the festivities, which will take place February 25. The new yacht is to be named "Alice," in honor of Miss Rooseveltand a cousin of the Emperor, the Czarina of Russia, who was the Princess Alix of Hesse, grand-daughter of Queen Victoria.

President Roosevelt has selected Hon. White-law Reid of New York, General James H. Wil-son of Delaware and Capt. Charles Edgar-Clark of the U.S. Navy, to represent the United States at the coronation of the King and Queen of England in May next.

While one half of our country shivers in the bleak winter of the North, the other portion is basking in southern resorts. Year by year the number of those who are able to "chase summer" increases and out of door amusements are pursued from our summer resorts steadily south to winter resorts.

Now some of the critics are trying to prove that Satan never was in Heaven. As the nonorthodox long since reasoned him out of an infernal kingdom there seems no place left for him but this earth. We at least have to admit that he seems rather busy here.

If the novelists and play writers show as indefatigable industry in the future as they do at present no, field of American life, manners, customs or ideas will be left unexploited. We have dialect vernacular and localisms until North is South, and East is West in thorough knowledge of local speech, ideas and traditions. As these books increase it becomes more and more evident that no single book can ever hope to be the great American novel. Our territory is too vast and too diversified to compress in the narrow limit of one book. The Philippines, Porto Rico, Guam and Hawaii yet remain as fresh fields for the novelist who would photograph American life in all its varied aspects.

We cannot but feel more than the usual interest in all that relates to Spain. An inquiry has recently been instituted relating to the fate of some thousands of Spanish prisoners who are believed to be yet in the hands of the insurgents. The Spanish government has been characteristically slow to act in the matter and a committee of women relatives of the prisoners have solicited Mrs. Dewey to present a memorial to our Congress asking its kindly offices in ascertaining the fate of the captives. This is the last session of the Spanish Cortes that will meet under the regency of the Queen. In May, Alfonso comes of age. There are many who predict a radical change of policy in Spain and the institution of many needed reforms at that time. Spain has not been a success as a colonial power but the United States today has a better appreciation of the difficulty of the problem of rule over an alien race than she had when we acquired the territory from

The fierce white light that beats upon a throne makes royal domestic infelicity even more of a tragedy than such affairs usually are. Europe has had two royal love matches within the past few years. Servia's young king wedded the woman of his choice in the face of all opposition. He seemed a veritable Prince Charming of the old fashion days of true love. Then Holland's girl queen chose whom she wanted as Prince Consort. Now all Europe is receiving tresh assurance that Love is truly blind and no less so than when he shoots his arrows towards a throne. It is the royal parties to these marriages, the ones who made the selections who are becoming weary of their bargain. Royal divorces are the topics of the hour in both Holland and Servia and as there are no children to be considered in either household, the sharers of the thrones may find themselves divorced.

The honorable senator from Massachusetta has awakened much interest by his apparently honest declaration that the nations of the earth should purchase an island and deport to it all anarchists who could then work out their systems of no government to their own edification and to the annoyance of no one else. Many papers have been at a loss whether to consider the proposition jest or earnest. If the latter what then? Whom shall we deport? How shall we define anarchy! Is it resistance to legal government and law? We have laws that provide for the punishment in such cases. Is it incendiary utterances against existing social. political or religious conditions? Is it assassination of a ruler? How shall we define anarchy? Are lynch law and mob rule anarchy? Are we to have political criminals like those of Russia and a Saghelian like Russia's convict island? Public sentiment must be the island of exile for anarchists while crimes that come within the reach of the law must have adequate punishment proportioned to the crime. Assault with intent to kill is too lightly punished whether the victim be president or pauper. Senator Hoar's proposition is the plan of an idealist who has been too long removed from the stern school of facts.

combination of rhyme that exaggerated sentiment could devise. The maid of today as she gazes upon the time yellowed record of a love that wrote itself as deathless may smile—partly in derision at the manner of expression but wholly in sympathy after all with the sentiment. She and her world are ashamed to give such poetic expression to the feeling—but the feeling is there. In this age of extravagance and display the intrinsic value of the gift says in the century's intense material fashion what the time worn paper does, "I love you." It is true the bunch of hot house violets may rest in a bowl of priceless china or the basket of orchids may contain a jewelled heart; for after all these things do the Gentiles seek. Yet without the old fashion sentiment that the festival commemorates, the gifts would lose value for to "loyal hearts the value of all gifts must be the giver." So to good old Saint Valentine we pledge the faith and worship of the world of today. The expression of the sentiment changes with the passing years but the sentiment is as old as the world.

February has two days that bid the busy rushing American pause a moment to reflect. The twelfth and the twenty-second of February are holidays in some states in honor of two Saint Valentine never has a chance to feel the pangs of jealousy that the old pagan gods must have endured when they saw their shrines deserted. Saint Valentine's day is in honor of a sentiment and feeling that is more deathless than the sad old world itself—that is Love. The fourteenth of February is given over to observances in honor of Saint Valentine. Many of these are of very ancient origin and have fallen into disuse. The old Saint Valentine customs yielded to the fashion of our grandmother's day when poetry held sway. On paper lace stationery the love lorn swain of that time indicted original rhymes to the object of his admiration. It was the day of Ladies Annual of Books of Beauty, of sloping shoulders and paper robes, of unrequited love and broken hearts. The verses were compounded of "hearts and darts" "doves and loves" and any other"

Every child in this land should be given a good readable biography of Lincoln and of Washington so that the lives of those men may be real living entities in the minds of the coming generation. Exercises are held in most of the public schools but necessarily these must be devoted to sentiment rather than fact. There are sturdy truths and principles to be understood by a careful reading of these two lives, representing as they do the aristocratic side of our people through Washington and the "plain people" through Lincoln. Both extremes can and should contribute to the sustaining and upbuilding of our nation by an active interest in public affairs. These two men taught that and a perusal of their lives will continue their spirit in the new generation and Next Month's Comfort to Contain a Wonderful Song by a Famous Author.

The Reproduction of Two Letters Comfort is Here Able to Print this Month Gives Our Readers a Good Idea How the Per-tonal Correspondence is Handled for the Heads of Two of the Greatest Nations on

HE Editor of "Comport" calls special attention of its subscribers to the song to be printed in next month's issue, entitled "You Can Only Have One Mother," the words and sentiment of which speak for themselves. This song is likely to have a very large sale not alone on account of the very pretty melody to which the words have been happily wedded by the authoress, Mrs. Louise Wray, who happens to be a young woman although having just passed the allotted three score and ten (Mrs. Wray is just 76 years of age) is a remarkable instance of what even old people can accomplish even in what might rightfully be considered their declining days.

Mrs. Wray is an Englishwoman, the mother of about a dozen children and as grandmother and great-grandmother lays claim to being almost as prolific as the late Queen of England to whom incidentally she dedicated the song and to whose son, King Edward, she recently sent a copy and whose letter photographed from the original you no doubt will enjoy reading.

from the original you no doubt will enjoy reading.

Mrs. Wray, when her song was first published—a few months since, wrote a letter to Mrs. McKinley in which she said:

RESPECTED MADAME:
I send you, herewith, a complimentary copy of my song which I would like you to call to the attention of your respected and beloved husband whose love for his mother has endeared him to the hearts of all of our ex," and was gratified at receiving the following

DEAR MADAM:

In Mrs. McKinley's behalf I beg to ackn owledge the receipt of your favor of recent date, and to thank you for the courtesy which you have been good enough to extend to her.

Very truly yours,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU, Secretary to the President.

the courtesy which you have been good enough to extend to her.

Cery truly yours,

Geo. B. Cortelyou, Secretary to the President.

She also sent copies to a number of other prominent people in every instance received replies exceedingly complimentary, among others a letter from Bishop Potter of New York, and has kept the postmaster of her village busier than he has been in a decade past, attending to the letters she received from all sorts and conditions of people from one end of the world to the other, all of whom speak in the highest possible way of the old lady's song.

Mrs. Wray was not unknown to fame in her earlier days, having had the honor of being the first singer to introduce "Columbia The Gem of the Ocean" to an American public, and it is rather a peculiar coincidence that Mr. Saalfield, her publisher, who some twenty years ago made an attempt to get Jenny Lind to revisit this country and who failing to do so (Jenny Lind was then almost seventy years of age) induced Madame Anna Bishop (the wife of the man who wrote "Home Sweet Home") and with Madame Anna Bishop who was then almost eighty years of age gave a Jenny Lind concert at Steinway Hall, New York, which packed that auditorium to its utmost seating capacity and brought to that concert not alone the aged and crippled, but in some instances people who were positive invalids who for the sake of "Auld Lang Syne" undertook to visit a place of amusement which they had not for years previously attempted, all of which was at the time commented on extensively by the Press of the discounter to the heavent of the discounter of the sake of discounter to the heavent of the day.

Rubber reaches the manufacturer full of dirt. First of all, the lumps are almost ways cut open to remove the stone which may have been used to increase the weight. Then it is soaked, broken up by a mighty machine, and cleansed by letting water run through it over and over. HERE are some curious superstitions connected with some of the mosques in Cairo. In one of them, for instance, are two columns which are believed by the faithful to mark the exact spot where the ark rested after its voyage. The same spot is also claimed to be the place where Abraham offered the ram in place of his son Isaac. These columns, of course, are supposed to possess the most wonderful curative properties, and diseased believers rub them with pieces of orange and lemon peel which are afterwards applied to the affected parts. In case of stomach trouble it is believed that licking these columns will bring about a cure.

The Nicaragua Canal.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HERE have been many measures pending in the Congress of the United States from time to time that have attracted the that have attracted the attention of the whole country, but few have created more intense interest than the bill of Congressman Hepburn of Iowa, chairman of the House committee on Inter-State and Foreign Commerce, recommend-

WILLIAM P. HEPBURN. ing the selection of the Nicaragua route for building an Isthmian canal, which was discus-sed in the house after the holiday recess. After days of debate, during which many speeches were made for and against the bill, amend-ments were offered and defeated, parliamentary objections were invoked and brushed aside, the objections were invoked and brushed aside, the bill in its original form was passed by an overwhelming vote. Only two members of the House voted against the bill on its final passage, while 308 voted for it.

The bill was passed on Friday, January 9, and went to the Senate, where Senator Morgan of Alabama took it in charge. It has not yet been considered by the upper branch of Congress and its fate in that body is problematical though it is said a majority of Senators favor the measure.

he Caribbean sea, at a po Nicaragua, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point on the Pacific coast near Brito, and also construct proper harbors at the termini of said canal and to make nec-essary provisions for the defense of the canal and harbors. It is likewise provided that in the construction of the can-al the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua shall be used as far as they are available. The governments of Nicara-gua and Costa Rica are to be guaranteed the use of the canal and harbors, of the canal and harbors, of the canal and harbors, upon terms to be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by those states and by their citizens.

The bill fixes the aggregate cost at $180,000,000, and makes a present appropriation of $10,000,000 to at once begin operations, and authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into proper contracts for material and work, such to be paid for as appropriations are made from time to time.

Now that the first steps toward the construction of an American ship canal across the isthmus separating North and South America have been taken, it only needs the concurrence of the Senate to make the stupendous project a possible reality. The President will interpose no objection to the measure; indeed, he has advocated the immediate construction of a canal in public utterances and in private conversation.

Although there have been other schemes for

He will carry out the wishes of Congress.

Although there have been other schemes for building a canal across the isthmus, none have Secured such powerful endorsement as the Nicaragua route. The Panama canal has been begun, the people of France having contributed millions of money for the project, but the impression is deep-rooted that no consignified company pression is deep-rooted that no quasi-private company can succeed in constructing such a gigantic engineering enterprise as this must necessarily be through individual effort. No doubt the promoters of the Panama com-SENATOR MORGAN. pany realize this fact, for they offer to sell their route to the United States for $40,000,000, although they claim to have spent more than one hundred millions of dollars in the work they have thus far done.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, binding the United States and Great Britain to neutrality, the protocol with the state of Nicaragua granting to this country a perpetual lease of a strip ing to this country a perpetual lease of a strip of territory ten miles wide for the purposes of the canal, the favorable attitude of the Presi-dent and the recent vote in the House of Representatives, seem to assure the route across Nicaragua. Besides, surveys made in 1876, 1880 and several times since, show this route to be the most feasible.

The total distance across the isthmus from Graytown to Brito is 169 1-2 miles, of which 26.85 miles will be excavated canal, and 142.65 miles free navigation. The locks and excavated channels will have a depth of thirty feet, and the San Juan river, where needed, will be dredged to a depth of 28 feet. There will be six locks and two dams, of which three locks and one dam will be between Graytown on the east coast and dam will be between Graytown on the east coast and Lake Nicaragua; and one dam and three locks between Lake Nicaragua and Brito on the west coast of Nicaraguan Minister, the isthmus. The estimated time of transit for steamers at the regular speed, according to circumstances, is 28 hours; and the number of vessels that, with single locks, could be passed through in a single day is stated at 32. The available water supply is estimated at ten times the quantity required for 32 lockages a day.

In comparison with existing canals the Nicaragua will be the deepest in the world. The North Sea and Baltic is 28 feet; Corinth in Greece is the same depth; Suez, 27.90; Burges, 26.26; Manchester, 26; Amsterdam, 23 feet.

The estimated time within which the canal can be opened for traffic is six years from the beginning of the work.

The Isthmian Canal Commission, of which John Grimes Walker, a retired Rear Admiral of the navy, is chairman, has reported in favor of the Panama route. The Commission consists of Admiral Walker, ex-Senator Pasco of Florida, George S. Morison, of New York, Lieut. Col. O. H. Ernst of Washington, Alfred Noble of Chicago, Brigadier General Peter C. Hains, of Baltimore, William H. Burr, of New York, Professor Emory R. Johnson and Lewis Muhlenberg Haupt, of Philadelphia. These gentlemen reported in favor of the Nicaraguan route, but since the Panama combut since the Panama company has made an offer to sell its property the Com-mission has made a supple-mentary report in which the Panama route is advocated.

though it is said a majority of Senators favor the measure.

The bill as passed authorized the President to secure from the states of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, in behalf of the United States, control of such portion of the territory belonging to those states as may be desirable and protect a canal suitable to the wants of modern navigation and commerce, and appropriates such a sum as may be necessary to secure the control of said territory.

After securing control of the needed territory the President is authorized to direct the Secretary of War to construct such canal from the Caribbean sea, at a point near Graytown in Nicaragua, by way of out reserve, for $40,000,000,wholly changes the situation.

The report is voluminous, going into all phases of the question and attempting to meet the objection that any legal complication will arise out of the purchase, or that there will be any international difficulties should the deal be concluded.

To further complicate matters the "Darien route" is being advocated by prominent engineers as the most available of all that has been proposed. The promoters of this canal say it can be built from the Gulf of San Blas on the Caribbean side to Panama Bay at a point about thirty miles east of the city of Panama at a cost of $100,000,000,000, but the Isthmian Canal Commission says it will cost $289,770,000.

Apparently, the difficulty of determining upon the route for an isthmus canal is as great today as it was when the first survey was made by Col. A. W. Childs more than fifty years ago.

Voracious Records of the Doin's in the Cobb Corner Postoffice, "Writ out" by the Boy Behind the Counter.

[EDITOR'S NOTE. The quaint philosophers, the dry wags, the shrewd dickerers and the eminent yarn-spinners of the countryside make a forum of the country postoffice when there is room at the rear around the big stove. The stories and incidents on which some of the most successful human interest novels of the day are constructed come from the quaint loungers around the stores in Yankee communities. These official records of "Jeth's Crowd" are to be taken down month by month for the readers of "Comfort," and we hope that as you become acquainted with the members of the "Congress" your interest in their discourse and stories will deepen.

In the March number of "Comfort" the "Cobb's Corner Congress" will continue sessions.

"Wal, I think p'raps the weather would stiffen cream up a little if it was left out over night," Chet admitted. He pulled off a big blue shaggy beard. "Anything for out back folks?" he asked. The Postmaster fingered in one or two boxes and then shook his head at the wicket. He was just shifting his chew and therefore didn't find it convenient to speak.

"Wal, I wish I could help 'em out," said the Postmaster, "but I hain't got no way of poking people up to write letters. All I can do is to deliver 'em over when they get along."

"They was so gol-nation sure about that letter!" mused Chet. "Say, Jeth, ye don't mind takin' another look do ye jest to make sure?"

"Wal," snapped The Postmaster somewhat testily. "I might borry the telescope from the Lick observatory and take a special and thorough look through the postoffice jest for the benefit of the Waterses. Jt may be that the letter they are expecting has accidentally got benefit of the Waterses. It may be that the letter they are expecting has accidentally got into one of my hollow teeth or I may comb it out of my whiskers when I get up tomorrer mornin'. Wal, not if the court knows herself and she thinks she does."

"You put on more sire and get off more sass

"You put on more airs and get off more sass than the postmaster of New York City," said Chet disgustedly and he made way for Aunt 'Phrony Sawyer who called at the wicket for her Zion's "Adversary," as the Postmaster always called it in fun.

As she turned to go away after receiving the paper something dropped out on the floor. Chet picked it up and handed it to her. That letter got folded into that newspaper in some way, gol-darned if I know how. I 'pologize for anything I might have said to ye, Chet, but people do get so sassy in front of that wicket that it does aggravate a man dretful."

"Wal," said Chet somewhat ungraciously, "before ye sass the next man ye better find out whether ye're in the wrong or not. A man never knows when he's goin' to knock a pop foul, even if he is at work for the 'Nited States govument."

The man from the back "deestrick" shoved the letter into his breast pocket and strolled out to the stove at the rear of the store. A large part of the Cobb's Corner Cracker-barrel Congress was in session, early in the day though it was.

"What you and Jeth heifered up over?" asked Uncle Wack Spofford.

"Oh, that two-legged encyclopedy there with a chaw of terbacker for a back mark has been open ag'in at the page headed 'Damphool'", snorted Chet. "He knows so darn much that his brain must have wrinkles in it like the gouges round the neck of a Merine buck."

"Jeth sort of feels that he reprusents the govument and he throws it on a leetle too thick sometimes," said Teed Strout.

"These men that know it all remind me of the time that Hen Hartshorn went down to Nubble Head to visit his cousin at the seashore," said Chet. "Hen is one of those fellers that knows everything at least two weeks before it ever happens. He never asked any advice of any one in his life even though he's givin' it away all the time. But he never seems to run out. If a man starts to tell him anything Hen always snorts out, 'Oh, yes, I know—I know!' And the interestin' part of it is, he never does know. He never stopped long enough to find out anything in all his life. Why, one time he drove down to the railroad station to unload some potatoes. He hollered to the station agent, before he crossed the track, to find out if the express train had gone past. 'Ten minutes late at the last station'—the agent started to say. He was goin' to add that prob'ly, though, the express had made up the time. But Hen chopped right in. 'All right—all right—I know!' And then he drove round the corner of the station right onto the track. The goin' was bare there and his runners stuck. The next minute the express tore round the corner of the station right onto the track. The goin' was bare there and his runners stuck. The next minute the express. But Hen happened to be previous enough that time to get off the team. Hen happened to be previous enough that time to get off the team.

"As I was tellin' ye about that trip to the seashore. He wanted to visit his cousin and do a leetle fishin'. The cousin told him that the mackerel were jest a dite shy at that time and the weather didn't look settled enough for a trip outside very fur the first day. But he told Hen that prob'ly he could have consid'able fun goin' out lobst'rin, while he, the cousin, was baitin' the trawls for the next day's fishin'. Then the cousin went to tell him suthin' about how to set the pots.

But Hen sliced right in with his 'Oh, I know-I know!'
And away he went down to where the dory was moored.
Hen had never been at the seashore before in his life and the cousin knew it. But he thought if Hen was so mighty knowin' he'd let him wallop round a while.

"Wal s'r, Hen staid out there all day, rowin' from Quahaug Point to Cow Ledge, sploshety-swosh, his oars whirlin' like a windmill in a gale. The cousin was settin' baitin' trawls and could watch him all the time and he wondered how he could keep so busy. The cousin reckcould watch him all the time and he wondered how he could keep so busy. The cousin reckoned that Hen did know at least a leetle suthin' about the science of catchin' lobsters, and he reckoned that if he was as lucky as he was busy he was makin' money out there.

"Along about sundown Hen rowed in and came doublin' up to the house with his hands on his back. He called for some taller to put on his palms.

"'Reckin ye must have got a slew of lobsters, Hen,' said the cousin. 'Never see a man so busy as you've been a-pullin' pots.'

"'Never caught a ding-hecked lobster,' groaned Hen. 'Don't b'lieve there was ever a lobster down there except me.'

"'Wal, it's funny ye didn't catch none after workin' the way you did,' said the cousin. 'How deep did ye set your pots?"

"Set pots!" snorted Hen. 'What are ye talk-

"You couldn't have caught Chet here on that lobster bus'ness, boys," he said. "Did ye ever hear how well posted Chet is on this salt water end of the line?"
"No" was the chorus "what about 12?"

"No," was the chorus, "what about it?"
"Don't ye go to tellin' no lies about me, now," commanded Chet.

"Don't be stoppin' a man, Chet, when he's ready to praise ye about how much ye know," said Teed Strout.

Then he turned it over and looked at the back of the envelope. Then he looked once more at the address. Chet was watching him through the window with a huge grin growing under his thawing beard. The Postmaster's face was a study.

"Lord Chief Mogul of the 'Nited States postoffice department," said Chet, "may I be so office department," said Chet, "may I be so many cheats in these partunt things that ye couldn't tell nothin' 'bout it unless ye 'tended to the matter yourself. So he hitched up and drove down to the coast, fifty miles. Chet kind of got the idea that the storekeeper council that section of the coera right round. through the store to get onto the landin'. Chet kind of got the idea that the storekeeper owned that section of the ocean right round there and he didn't see no way of gettin' at the water except goin' through the store, 'cause the banks were so steep. He went in and says to the man, 'is all that out there nice fresh seawater?' 'Yes,' says the man, 'it's jest been dumped in this mornin'.' 'I want to get this jug full,' says Chet. 'Go out and help yourself,' says the man. When Chet came back he says, 'How much do you tax me?' 'Call it five cents,' says the man. So Chet paid and come away." 'Say, look here—'commenced the hero of the tale, but the others shut him off by shouting "Go ahead, Jeth!"

The Postmaster scratched among his whiskers and pursing his lips humorously went on:
"Wal, after that jug of water give out, Chet's wife said it done her so much good and was so savin' of doctor's bills that she wished she had another jug full. So Chet went down ag'in. Went to the same place. Same man there.

"'I'd like another jug of that same seawater,' says Chet. 'All right,' says the man, 'go 'long out and help yourself jest the same's ye did before.'

"When Chet was there before, the tide was water,' says Chet. 'All right,' says the man, 'go 'long out and help yourself jest the same's ye did before.'

"When Chet was there before, the tide was in. Now it was way out over the flats and Chet had to shin down the trestle-work to fill his jug. When he came back he asks: 'Any lift in the price, mister?' 'No,' says the man, 'only five cents jest the same. Why!' 'Wal,' says Chet, 'I see ye've had such a thund'rin' big bus'ness since I was here last and reduced the stock so I didn't know but what ye'd come up a leetle.'"

"Ye're a liar," said Woodrow. jumping up and shakhis fist in the Postmaster's face. He tried to say more but the laughter drowned him out. The Postmaster saw that he had made a hit.

"Now look here, boys," he went on. "While everything is pleasant I'd like to read ye a leeeverything is pleasant I'd like to read ye a leetle piece of portry I've writ on my bus'ness here. When ye've heard it I b'lieve ye'll have more charity for a man in a second-class postoffice." But before he got the brown paper out of his pocket the Congress had dissolved. Chet was the last man out.
"Say, Jeth," he yelled back, "better put that piece of portry to pickle in some of that salt water I got down to the coast. I'll bring ye in a jug full when I drive out ag'in."
"Them critters is the most dead set agin literature of any crowd I ever see," murmured the Postmaster angrily, as he went forward to draw a can of kerosene for the Walkers' little boy.

THE SALT OF THE EARTH.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY W. J. LAMPTON

S there a reader of COMFORT who does not know what salt is? There may be some who do not know that it is the same thing as chloride of sodium, but as common salt, I fancy there is not one person who does not know enough to read anything. Yet how many of COMFORT's readers, as intelligent as they are, know where all the salt comes from that we use in the United States, or how much of it we use every year? Most of them take a pinch of salt for their vegetables or their meat, or shake a little out of the cellar into a bowl of soup, but what would they think if they could soup, but what would they think if they could be shown by actual figures that the people of the United states use a bushel of salt per per-be shown by actual figures that the people of the United states use a bushel of salt per person every year?

According to the latest census statistics we used in this country in 1900 4,600,782,200 pounds of salt and our population was 76,149,386, which goes into the other big number, sixty and four tenths times, that is 60.4 pounds, which is a little over a bushel per person. Of this salt we produced all but eight and three tenths per cent. under our own vine and fig tree, or 15,187,819 barrels, of five bushels each.

Although salt is of such common use it is not found generally distributed in all the states, at least, in paying quantities, and almost the entire quantity comes from fifteen states, extending from Massachusetts to California and from Michigan to Louisiana. Michigan leads the list of salt producing states with 5,206,510 barrels although previous to 1859 the state produced none. New York comes second with nearly 5,000,000 barrels and Kansas, which does not seem to be such a salty state, is third over 1,600,000 barrels. Ohio is fourth with over 1,400,000 barrels, and no other state reaches the million point. Oklahoma is in the list with nearly five thousand barrels, and Massachusetts is last with only nine hundred and eighty barrels. is last with only nine hundred and eighty bar-

The first salt ever made in this country was near Cape Charles in Virginia away back yonder in 1620, the year the Pilgrim Fathers landed in Massachusetts. They tried to make salt four years later at Plymouth, but were not a processful. See water was used, but the piolanded in Massachusetts. They tried to make salt four years later at Plymouth, but were not successful. Sea water was used, but the pioneers were too busy with other things to make their salt, and so until the Revolution they brought it from the other side of the ocean. When the Revolution shut off their source of supply they were thrown upon their own resources which they soon found were ample to meet all demands. A great deal of salt was made from sea water about New Bedford and Cape Cod, up to 1812, but salt from springs, or wells, was taking its place and it was not long until the sea was nearly deserted. At least on the Atlantic coast. California makes most of her product from the tide lands near San Francisco, where great evaporating ponds are diked off and the water exposed to the sun. So with the Utah product, the wonderful Great Salt Lake furnishing all the brine that may be needed, and proving an inexhaustible supply, even if every other salt source in the country were shut off. Salt made in this way is called solar salt, and 910,974 barrels of it are made, Utah producing only a little over 235,000 barrels, which shows plainly that the Great Salt Lake is not being drained to salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is salt in the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is salt in the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt, this beat the salt is known as rock salt earth.

Another salt is known as rock salt, this being so called from its hardness. It is mined like coal and the chief sources of it are Kansas, New York and Louisiana. The famous rock salt mines of Avery Island, Louisiana, have been worked for more than a hundred years, but the supply from there is comparatively small now. Kansas at first made her salt from marsh brine, but in 1887 prospectors, looking for petroleum, discovered veins of rock salt, as many as fifteen, varying from four to eighteen feet thick within a depth of two hundred and sixty-five feet, and since that time rock salt has been a great industry in Kansas. Over two and a half million barrels of rock salt are produced yearly, New York being second to Kansas.

All the other salt produced is made by the kansas.

All the other salt produced is made by the boiling process, that is to say, the brine is taken from wells bored either into salt veins or into brine veins, and the water is run into evaporating pans or vats and boiled until the salt is deposited. Some of it is used without refining, as for packing and in silver mining by the chlorination process, but vast quantities are refined and shipped all over the country.

At one time salt was quite expensive, but by the consolidation of capital and the adoption of the most approved methods of production, it is now brought to a point of cheapness that is almost beyond any comprehension of profit. The total value of the product of 1889 was $7,966,897, or only about fifty cents a barrel, or ten cents a bushel, about six pounds for a cent. A long while ago when it was said of a man he wasn't worth his salt, he might have had some value, but in these days not much worse could be said of his unworthiness.

As an indication of the centralization of industries and capital the salt interests afford a be said of his unworthiness.

As an indication of the centralization of industries and capital the salt interests afford a study in economics. In 1860 there were three hundred and ninety-nine establishments making salt, while in 1900 there were only one hundred and fifty-nine, a falling off of two hundred and forty, although these one hundred and fifty-nine salt works turned out nearly eight million dollars' worth of salt to about two million dollars' worth produced by the three hundred and ninety-nine.

eight million dollars' worth of salt to about two million dollars' worth produced by the three hundred and ninety-nine.

Economists who study year in and year out, trying to find out how long this necessity of life and that will last under our extravagant manner of using it, need never worry over our salt supply. No matter how wasteful we may be of it there will always be enough to go around, and although we may run out of all other condiments there will always be salt.

A little something about the history and symbolism of salt may be interesting. Naturally enough salt occurs early in Biblical history, because from the earliest times of the chosen people they lived near the Dead Sea, which supplies inexhaustible quantities of the useful substance. In other parts of the world, however, salt was less plentiful, and in some parts it was as valuable as gold. Among the Greek, Roman and Semitic peoples salt was always associated with offerings of a sacrificial character. Homer calls it "divine," Plato speaks of it as a "substance dear to the gods," and the Bible mentions a "covenant of salt" as made over a sacrificial meal in which salt was speaks of it as a "substance dear to the gods," and the Bible mentions a "covenant of salt" as made over a sacrificial meal in which salt was a necessity. Its preservative quality was held to make it a peculiarly fitting symbol of enduring compact and influenced the choice of the particular element of the covenant meal as that which was regarded as sealing the obligation to fidelity. Among the ancients, and among orientals of today every meal including salt has a certain sacred character. "There is salt between us," "to eat the salt of the palace" and "untrue to salt" are among the phrases used as indicating the relationship of the people. In the less remote ages in England, the salt on the table was the line of demarcation separating the less from the greater guests, and to be above the salt was equivalent to being separating the less from the greater guests, and to be above the salt was equivalent to being among the "400" of the time. Among the superstitious, salt is a prime factor and to upset the salt is a sure sign of bad luck unless the person upsetting it at once throws a pinch over his left shoulder to get into the eyes of the imp who is supposed to be standing there ready to do his bad deeds. do his bad deeds.

249 PRIZES all CASH or as good as CASH, worth just ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVEN DOLLARS AND NINETY-FIVE CENTS. We send you the sample papers and picture cach one's work and credit you and pay you for getting even one subscriber. As "COMFORT" and art Souvenir Picture out one's work and credit you and pay you for getting even one subscriber. As "COMFORT" subscription price may soon be advanced to 50c. per year, this opportunity to work on this plan is very favorable indeed and no matter how many papers there are in the home they all want and will surely take "COMFORT" with the new Picture Offer at only 25c. per year. It is big pay and no money invested.

These SPECIAL PRIZES are given in ADDITION to the REGULAR PREMIUMS, because club-raisers in small towns do not have so favorable an opportunity to get a large list of subscribers as those who work in large places; therefore these SPECIAL PRIZES will be AWARDED to those who send in the largest list of subscribers in proportion to the population of the town in which the club is raised. Thus the person taking subscriptions in the smallest village has just as good a chance to earn the LARGEST SPECIAL PRIZE as the one who canvasses in the largest city. For instance, NINE subscriptions from a town of 750 population WOULD Win against a list of 100 subscriptions from a city of 10,000 population.

We give these Special Prizes as Rewards of Merit for persevering and sincere effort according to opportunity, on the same principle of the beautiful scripture parable whereby the widow's mite was accounted greater than the large contribution of the rich man. Do not be discouraged from trying for a Special Prize merely because you live in a small town. Your chance is just as good, because you will not have to get so many subscribers as you would in a larger place. Besides, whether you earn a Special Prize or not, you are SURE OF YOUR PAY for every subscription you get and send us. If you win a special prize, it comes in addition to your regular c

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: February may be a short month as meas ured by days, but viewed in the light of the number of commemorative days which it contains it is surely a full month. We cele-brate the birthdays of Lincoln, of Washington and of Saint Valentine in February, to say nothing of Candlemas day, which marks for us, according to the old traditions, the length of the

"As far as the sun shines in on Candlemas day So far will the snow blow in before May."

and also by the length of the shadow of the poor little, much berated woodchuck or groundhog on that day.

I haven't a single letter appropriate to the month, however, in spite of the great inducements held out by all these anniversaries, but I have plenty of good letters notwithstanding. The first one which comes to hand treats of an ostrich farm down in Florida, where they have no snow wherewith to measure the probable length of the winter. Our cousin says:—

one which comes to hand treats of an ostrich farm down in Florida, where they have no snow wherewith to measure the probable length of the winter. Our cousin says:—

NE of the attractions of Jacksonville, Florida, is, to me, the ostrich farm I o cated there. There are now several branch farms in our country, but the headquarters are at Jacksonville, and the production of ostrich feathers is among the varied industries of this region.

"Every bird has its own name, and, like the colored race, bears it proudly. Such makes as President and Langtry (a beauty). etc., were among them. The colored race, bears it proudly. As ark Hanna, Prince of Wales, Lilian Langtry (a beauty). etc., were among them. The male selects his mate, and is ever after devoted to her. Should she die he never mate sagain, but remains faithful to her memory. One large bird was pointed out to me who had been a widower for nearly thirty years, his owners having tried in vain to remate him.

"After the male has selected his mate the pair are put in a separate corral and they at one commence to build a nest, the male bird doing the work. He rests his breast bone on the ground and kicks out the sand behind him until he has dug a round hole, probably a foot deep and four feet in diameter, turning himself during the work in order to keep the hole round. When it is finished the hen begins to lay eggs, one every other day, until twelve or fifteen are deposited in the nest. She then scatters a little sand over them to protect them from the heat of the sun. During the laying season the male is dangerous. Herce, and should be careful of swing, the eggs, suithly his may be the remarkable intelligence of the bird.

"This programme continues for forty-two days, at the end of which time the chicks may be heard making a noise within the shell. Then the mother sitting.

"The ostrich is voracious, eating with equal appetite oranges, stones, leather, and even newspapers when tightly rolled. Gravel is supplied them freely, and mounds of oyster shells and bones are home of the gulls on Duck Island. Here, probab-ly, the woodchuck sleeps his winter away, only varying the monotony of the performance by com-ing out of his hole on Candlemas day, to observe his shadow.

"Among the interesting places which I visited last summer was Duck Island, off the coast of Maine. A tiny steamer took us over from Mount Desert Island, one brilliant afternoon in July, winding in and out among the many small islands that crowd the coast along here, the sunlight making the sea seem bluer, the grass greener, and the lighthouses whiter than we had ever seen them before.

lighthouses whiter than we had ever seen them before.

"After about an hour's sail we reached the island, a low, desolate place, with a single white farmhouse the only sign of human habitation. The gulls which we had come to see were on the other shore facing the ocean, so we had to cross the island to find them. We followed the footpath through the rocky pastures, past what looked like sheepfolds of rough granite, to the sea on the other side. Here we turned and walked southward close along the gravelly 'sea wall', a huge natural dike formed by the stones cast up year after year by the waves. As we approached the southeastern end of the island we began to hear the harsh, discordant screams of the gulls, and soon they came in sight, one or two at first, and then more and more, until we seemed almost overshadowed by the birds that circled gracefully above us, their immense pale gray wings wide-spread.

mense pale gray wings wide-spread.
"Then a strange sight met us. For about a quarter of a mile the shore, rocky and bare, was lined with tall, gaunt, dead pine-trees, whose bare trunks and few limbs had bleached like bones to a glistening white in the wind and sun. On the topmost point of each one, with head and snowy breast toward the late, afternoon sun, was perched a huge white gull. Others were poised, about to settle down, and still others were flying aloft and uttering their discordant shrieks. We wondered why all the trees on the shore just here should have died, until one of the party suggested that the birds took with them to the treetops the fish which they had caught from the sea to devour them there, and that the salt water, dripping down upon the trees, day after day, had gradually killed them.

"As we turned to go back to the boat we saw that the waves for some distance out were white with the gulls which had settled down there close together and were rocking back and forth with the motion of the water. As we recrossed the island towards our boat we took a path over the rocks upon which were the nests of the gulls, some tucked away in corners, some on the bare flat rocks, big rough affairs, made of sticks and twigs, put together with apparently little care, but lined with moss, down or feathers. There were eggs in some of them, although it was late for them. These were rather larger than a hen's egg, brown inh white, with irregular spots of a darker brown. In the clefts between the rocks were the little ones, huddled close together, and hiding their heads like ostriches to escape observation. They were of almost the same color as the eggs, brown and whitish, spotted, and were covered with a soft, furry down. They were a ludicrous sight when walking over the rocks to get out of our way, and it was hard to imagine that the clumsy, ungainly, ugly, brown and white birds could ever grow into the graceful, pale grey gulls which circled above us.

"As we neared our boat the cries grew fainter and fainter and finally ceased, and once on board we could only picture in our minds the wei

"One lovely day of last autumn a merry party, of which your correspondent made one, took a drive out to the Kaolin Hills, six miles distant from Knoxville, Georgia. On the route thither is the highest point in the county. What a beautiful picture was there spread out before us! Far down in the valley below are two little towns, like twin sisters arrayed in white and adorned with eneralds. A sparkling stream bordered with a fringe of willows and golden rod cheerily glides between them salmon and white pipe clay. The sides are precipitous and form miniature resemblances to the chasm at Tallulah and the smaller canyons of Colorado. Already some of our young people have scrambled down the steep, water swept sides and are busy manufacturing tiny bricks and ornamental vases of the soft white substance found in the depths. In our pathway among the rocks and sand we find small scalloped sea shells, fragments of coral, and even several little star fish encrusted with lime. These five-pointed shells are called by the sailors 'five fingered Jacks,' and are prized for their artistic beauty and the wonderful arrangement of each little ornament in their stellated shells. Is it not surprising to find all of these children of the sea in a dry, hilly country two hundred and seventy miles from the Atlantic? Was this part of Georgia once the bed of the ocean in the age of the lower animals, or is there still some subterranean passage leading from the stormy deep?

"Deeply furrowed in this locality are eight other immense ravines lying parallel to each other, showing what a mighty work is wrought by water. A few years ago a small cottage was engulfed, and a well swept down during a freshet, so it is probable that in the course of time the entire hill will become a vast cavern.

"If those little time-worn shells within the mysterious depths could speak what wonderful stories they might tell us of the ages gone by! But their voiceless lips echo no sound, and we are left unenlightened, save by the studies and researches of scientific men."

LOULA K. ROGERS, Knoxville, Georgia.

DEAR AUNT MINERVA:

"I have found that from one small potato I can extract almost two tablespoonfuls of starch. This process interests me so much that I am going to tell you how I did it, hoping that some of the cousins may be interested and successful in a similar manner.

"Take an ordinary sized white potato, wash and pare it, being very careful to remove the specks. Then in a bowl place some cheese cloth so that it touches the inside of the bowl. With a large grater grate the potato into the cheese cloth in the bowl. The potato will probably discolor as soon as the air reaches it, but that does not harm it. Then gather up the cheese cloth in the hands so that the potato has no chance of escaping, and fill the bowl about two-thirds full of lukewarm water, and knead the potato by squeezing it in the water for about five minutes, being careful that none of it escapes from the cheese cloth. Then take the potato is now fit for nothing but to be thrown away.

"The water left in the bowl will look dirty, but that doesn't matter; let it stand for five or ten minutes without touching it; then pour off the dirty water, being very careful not to allow any of the substance in the bottom of the bowl to escape while doing it. Pour on some more water and let it stand as before for the same length of time; again pour off, and repeat the operation until the substance in the bottom of the bowl is white set the bowl in a warm place to dry out the moisture. When it is perfectly dry the substance which remains is the starch which you have extracted from the potato."

I always enjoy reading of the old times in our country and trying to picture to myself the lives of the people living then, and I think probably there are many of my nephews and nieces who will enjoy with me the next letter.

"On Marcus Plat, Stevens County, Washington, stand several old and historic buildings which were once the scene and center of great human activity. More than three quarters of a century ago this little community was composed of agents, factors, trappers and traders of the then great Hudson's Bay Fur and Trading Company. The post was first established very early in the last century, soon after the famous expedition of Lewis and Clarke to the Pacific Coast. For more than half a century it was occupied, known first as 'Fort Colville' and subsequently as 'Fort George' in honor of King George IV.

"For many years the region literally swarmed with Indians, some of whom were not friendly to these traders. Sanguinary conflicts resulted, which invariably terminated in favor of the 'Bostons' or 'Pale Faces.' As a matter of protection and safety a heavy wooden blockhouse was constructed and a high stockade built around the Post. Every vestige of the stockade has long since vanished but the several log buildings are still standing, old, bleached and weather-beaten, but still in a tolerable state of preservation. Conspicuous in the group stands the ancient blockhouse, which, in the years long since flown, has been a target for the savage hostilities, and in its time-worn sides are lodged hundreds of bullets. "This old, deserted and dilapidated Post stands within sight and sound of the famous Kettle Falls, of the Columbia river, and is now in the heart of a thickly settled country. Buildings and grounds are regarded as historic and are yearly visited by hundreds of people."

Here is an interesting bit upon the canning of tomatoes.

Be it emergies. The keeper removes all the young birds as they are hatched and places them under cover, thus leaving the parents at liberty for another sitting.

"The ostrich is voracious, eating with equal appetite oranges, stones, leather, and even newspapers when tightly rolled. Gravel is supplied them freely, and mounds of oyster shells and bones are kept in the yard for their use.

"An ostrich egg weighs about three and a half pounds. The most valuable feathers are grown on an adult male. The birds are examined every eight months and the ripe feathers removed. This must be done by a man skilled in the work, for careless plucking injures the future feathers. The short eathers are pulled, the heavy, wing feathers are repulled, the heavy, wing feathers are pulled, the heavy, wing feathers are but the worth of a bird in leathers is reckonsel at from thirty to sixty dollars per year, and a pair of ostriches will yield from five hundred to one thousand dollars worth of feathers if they live one thousand dollars worth of feathers if they live one thousand dollars worth of feathers if they live on relative to an old set." The suppression of cruelty to indiscepted extriches from their list of unfortinates, as it is claimed that there is no pain to lite bird. "When the cans are filled with tomatoes they are placed in boiling water while the cap is soldered on, a hole having been punched in it through which the air may escape, and which is closed by solder when this is accomplished. Some canners, however, prefer to solder the whole cap on, closing the little hole in the center before cooking the fruit. The last thing done is to label the can, after which the fruit is ready for the market."

Ned Todd.

The ranger was astonished. Who was this strange, all-knowing being, who seemed to read their very thoughts. After a few moments lost in wonder, he said:

"How did you know that I was Ned Todd?"

"Oh, that is a secret," she answered. "You are Ned Todd, the ranger, and in the employ of the young man here, whose name is Archibald Holland." Holland.

Archie started up with an exclamation of wonder.

"How did you learn so much?" he asked.

"Young man," she said quite solemnly,

"don't think that people who live in the woods are all fools. You left Muskogee two weeks ago."

"Did you see us there?" began Archie, but a look from the detective silenced him.

"I never saw you until to-day," she answered. Noting the glance of the detective, swered. Noting the glance of the detective, she added:

"Ned Todd, don't you be afraid that I will take advantage of this young man's inexperience. I will however talk with you."

"Who are you?" asked the ranger.

"I am more generally known as Oklahoma Peg."
"I thought so, I have heard of you."
"It you know much of me, you know that I am noted for truthfulness."
"I have heard so."
"Bad as I may be, I am not one to deceive, and now I advise you both to turn back."
"Why do you advise us to turn back."
"Because it is death to advance."
"We know what we are doing."
"No you don't, there are dangers here of which you know nothing."
"How far is it to Calvary Creek where the

"How far is it to Calvary Creek where the Boomers have settled?"
"Fully two hundred miles."

"We can probably reach there."
"You never will."

"Then we will go to Fort Sill." "You will never live to reach either place."
For a few moments the frontiersman fixed his keen gray eyes on the sharp black orbs of Oklahoma Peg, and she divining his look, said:

"Why don't you ask what you want to? You

"Why don't you ask what you want to? You have been long enough on the plains to know when to speak out."

"Where is our danger?" he asked. "Is it Indians, or Captain Snell's band?"

"Both," she answered quickly. "You are surrounded by foes of whom you know nothing, and cannot see. They are nearer than you suspect. You are in danger of being shot down at any moment by some unseen assassin."

sin."
"Peg I thank you for your advice."
"Won't you take it?"
"We have not decided."

"We have not decided."
"You had better."
"I'll decide as my judgment dictates."
"If I were you, Major, I would go back," she said, her black eyes burning with eagerness.
"What has become of the young lady that was captured to-day?" asked Ned Todd in order to change the topic of conversation.
"To-day?" To-day?

"Yes, Peg, you seem to know everything, ou must know that; a Miss Miller was captured to-day."

"By whom?"
"Captain Snell."

"Captain Snell."
"Her keen black eyes flashed fire, and she gnashed her white teeth in rage.
"Do you think we would turn back like cowards and leave that poor girl to her fate?"

asked Ned Todd.
"Do you know her?"
"No, I never saw her in my life."

"Then how know you that she was made a "Then now know, captive?"
"We buried her father, who received his death wound while he was defending her. He lived long enough to tell us what the villian had done."

"Ned Todd, if you will turn about, and go back, I will save the young lady." The ranger shook his head and said:

"No, no. Peg, we can make no such promises. If you have any desire to save the young lady, you should turn out at once and give us your assistance. Besides we have other business of importance that we must attend to."
"Then you will not take my advice?"

"Your blood be upon your own heads."
With a wild cry she sprang toward the brook, leaped across it and disappeared.

CHAPTER III.

A HIDDEN HOME. NEW PERIL.

Buried in the midst of the wood was a large comfortable house built of logs. The logs were fully two feet through, notched and fitting so closely as to be almost air tight. There was an addition at the end of the house and the whole contained several apartments. The roof was made of logs split and hewn down with such excellent mechanical skill as to be almost perfectly tight. It was as much a blockhouse as a dwelling.

This strange fort-like building was not over five miles from the spot where we left Ned Todd and Archie Holland. Strange as it may seem the house had been erected in these woods five or six years before the opening of our story, and yet it was wholly unknown to either the wnite or Indian authorities. Again, and again had the United States soldiers raided the country, driving out boomers or quelling the Buried in the midst of the wood was a large war-like spirits of the Indians, but to them the home in the wild wood was unknown.

Near by it was a small field cleared and in cultivation. Turkeys, chickens and geese were about the place in abundance. The grunt of pigs could be heard in their sty. The dark wood which surrounded the strange house came quite up to the door.

It was near sundown, and a man past middle age was sitting in front of the door, his head drooping until his chin rested on his chest as if he were almost asleep. There was a sort of a shuffling rolling noise from within and a horrid creature came wriggling its way to the door. It was a man. His hair was almost white as snow, the beard was short and white and bushy, and the hands and feet from some misfortune or deformity were twisted and misshapen until they were almost useless.

He made no effort to walk, but crawled and wiggled his way along. He saw the sleeping man in the chair and chuckled and rolled over on the floor in a most idiotic manner.

Rapid steps, coming down the forest path awoke the sleeper, and he started up very much as a guard caught napping on his post of duty.

"Very likely, perhaps we can here get lodg-ing and rest for the night, if we dare risk it."

"Risk it? Why there can surely be no risk it. We will have nothing to quarrel with an Oklahoma Boomer about."

"An Indian, then, if he is sufficiently civilized to build such a house, will be friendly to us."

It was with no little reluctance, however, that the two men approached the door, where the old man arose, and came out to meet them. "Yes."

"Ov you live here?" the ranger asked.

"Yes."

"Ov we give the door, it was a man. His hair was almost white as snow, the beard was short and white and bushy, and the hands and feet from some misfortune or deformity were twisted and missortune or deformity were twisted and misor turn away anybody who comes to his poor shanty. Seein' ez it's a good way from here to any other house, of course I'll take ye in and do the very best I kin with ye."

As they dismounted a peculiar c

A man about thirty or thirty-five years of age came up to the door at a rapid walk. He was armed with rifle and pistols.

"Bryce," he said.

"Well, captain, yer're back."

"Yes," he answered, panting with exertion, while his eyes gleamed wild with excitement.

"Are the sojers comin'?" asked the guard, seizing the rifle that stood leaning against the wall of the cabin.

"No."

"What is it, then? Suthin' I know is goin' ter happen."
"Two strangers are comin' this way."

"Two strangers are comin' this way."
"Good, they'll stay here to-night?"
"Yes Bryce, and it's to be their last night on earth. I tried to get 'em to go around but they wouldn't do it. Where is Peg?"
"Good. Have the boys been in with their prisoner?"
"Yes."
"It's agin' the rules. Capen."

"It's agin' the rules, Capen."
"But this is a girl, and sometimes there is more money in a live girl than in a dead one. I don't want Peg to see her, and probably she will not come back until things can all be fixed. Aye, here they come now."

fixed. Aye, here they come now."

Three men were coming through the wood on horseback. On a fourth horse sat a beautiful girl with large black eyes and long dark hair. One could tell at once by the fact that her hands were tied that she was a captive. Her face was deathly white and her eyes bore traces of weeping. It was Daisy Miller, whose father had been killed a few hours before by these desperadoes. these desperadoes.

"Oh sir, let me go, do pray let me go!" she implored, as the captain of this terrible banditti lifted her from the horse as if she had been an infant.

"Wait here," he said to his men, and hurried with the terror-stricken, horrified Daisy into the house.

the house.

Upon the floor, kicking and rolling about in a most idiotic manner, was the cripple to whom we have before referred. At sight of the captive he increased his idiotic chuckles and kicked and screamed as if he were highly delighted at sight of her.

"Be quiet, Snap," said the captain of the banditti, administering a not very gentle kick in the side of the idiot, which quieted him at once. "Come here, Miss, and now if ye will be quiet and behave yerself, ye shall be treated like a lady. But ef ye go ter kickin' out'n the harness, ye shall be put in the dungeon beharness, ye shall be put in the dungeon be-

"You shall be taken care of. Never mind now. In course of time you will find it all right."

With this unsatisfactory assurance he left her and went to where his three ruffians stood just outside of the house.

The captive took a quick survey of her prison and soon ascertained that escape was impossible. The windows were small and barred with iron bars, the doors were of massive oak, strengthened with iron bars on the inside, and bolted and locked on the outside.

The captain told his men to remain at a convenient distance from the house, but not come "Take them in, and entertain them well. Put them in our guest chamber up stairs, and mind you they must never get away."

"He, he, trust me for that Cap," said Bryce with a demoniacal laugh. "But where will you be all the time, Cap?"

"In convenient call."

"Yer sure they're comin'?"

"There hain't no doubt of it; and now d'ye see that they don't get away."

The sun was just sinking in the west, as two men appeared in the road leading to the house."

"There they come, now, Bryce. I must go and transfer my lady to the dungeon, she might make a noise and in some way excite their suspicions." As he went hastily across their suspicions." As he went hastily across the front room the idiotic cripple chuckled and giggled, and the bandit captain could not and giggled, and the bandit captain could not resist the temptation to pause and administer a severe kick in his side as he hastened to the room of the captive.

With little difficulty he conducted the pale, terror-stricken girl to the dungeon or cellarlike apartment beneath the house.

"Now if you cry out, or make any noise, I will gag you," he said.
"Go away and leave me alone and I will be quiet," she answered, plaintively.
"I will, but be sure that you make no noise down here, or you will have me back in a moment," and he bounded up the stone stairway, closing down and fastening the trap door as he went.

he went. When Ned Todd and Archie Holland came a sight of the strange habitation, they both halted and gazed in wonder. The detective ranger was even more astonished than his companion.

"I never saw or heard of that house before," he said, "though it seems to have stood there for years."
"Who lives there?"

"Who lives there?"
"I don't know."
"It must be a boomer."
"Very likely, perhaps we can here get lodging and rest for the night, if we dare risk it."
"Risk it? Why there can surely be no risk in it. We will have nothing to quarrel with an Oklahoma Boomer about."

brother, who's a cripple frum bein' froze."
Putting their horses in a sort of a corral, they went into the house where supper was soon prepared for them by the pretended boomer. It was dark before they sat down to partake of it. While at the table a pair of basilisk eyes glared at them from a narrow aperture, and Captain Snell, who was gazing unseen upon them, said to himself:

"It is he, I know him though it's years since I last saw his face, and he has changed greatly. It is Todd the frontier detective with him. Very good. There will be two fresh graves in my garden in the morning."

HERE are innumerable

HERE are in numerable ways in which one may enjoy himself provided he has money. But the question arises when one has very little of that necessity.

While I was on my vacation this summer I had an opportunity to see a house boat, and the occupants were getting as much pleasmore) as the millionaires who them daily in their superb steamure (perhaps steamed by them daily in their superb steam-yachts. House boats are made from all sorts of vessels and used in all kinds of waters, but this one was made from an old, tho' seaworthy, lumber vessel.

On deck was built a regular cabin twelve feet high and twenty-eight feet square, with three windows and a door. Inside the cabin, in one end, partitioned off by a curtain of denim were three bunks built one above the other and at the other end of the cabin was the cook-stove. Aside from these necessities the little house was fitted up with Chinese lanterns and the walls hung with ap-propriate pictures for decoration and comfort-able chairs. In temperat they make for herable chairs. In tempests they make for har-bors and in fair weather they hoist sail and cruise along the coast dropping anchor here and there for fishing. Taking it altogether for those who care for a quiet few weeks on the water there is nothing for comfort and convenience like a house boat.

It is now possible to be quickly cured of any form of rheumatism without having your stomach turned up-side-down or being half choked to death and made to vomit, and every sufferer from rheumatism should welcome this new and marvelous discovery with open arms and give it an honest trial. John A. Smith, Milwaukee, Wis., while apparently hopelessly sick with rheumatism, hit upon a combination of drugs and is generous enough to send a 50 cent box free to every sufferer who writes at once. It is a home treatment and will not keep you from your work.

As you know if you've tried them, every so-called rheumatic remedy on the market today, except this genuine cure, will cause you violent stomach pains and vomiting, and some of them are so dangerous they will cause heart trouble. And the worst of it is they never cure. When a person has rheumatism the constitution is so run down that he should be very careful what he puts into his stomach.

It therefore gives me pleasure to present a remedy that will cure every form and variety of rheumatism without one single unpleasant feeling. That remedy is

According to an article published recently in a French chemical journal, the output of sulphur in Sicily has increased from 150,000 tons in 1860 to 441, 000 in 1898. The whole world's product in these two years was 157,000 and 488,000 tons respectively. It will thus be seen that Sicily furnished more than 90 per cent. The amount of sulphur in the ore varies from a very rare richness of 75 per cent. to 20 or 25 per cent. in the ordinary ore. The older method of obtaining sulphur from its ore was by setting fire to it in heaps or in kilns, the sulphur itself serving as fuel. This method has, however, been discarded both on account of the waste and because of the intolerable nuisance to which the fumes of the burning sulphur gave rise. Extraction of the sulphur with carbon bisultid or with a concentrated solution of calcium chlorid is in many cases used, but the only method in which no noxious fumes are generated is the extraction with steam under pressure. The extent of the industry is rapidly increasing, and Sicily will long continue to supply the major part of the world's production.

Well, well, how swiftly the time flies, doesn't it? Here I have had hardly time to say "How d'y' do?" to you for the winter and this is the last month of the season. I hope you all had a pleasant New Year's and did not make any more resolutions than you could keep. But I must get to work, as all of you should do when there's work to be done.

The first question is from several of the cousins wanting to know what celandine is, as I gave it in a formula for a depilatory. Celandine is an herb of the poppy family, and my authority is the druggist, as yours must be; because we who do not know drugs must go to headquarters for information.

(7) Eighteen is too young to marry. Wait at least two years. (8) The bridesmaid does not dress the same as the bride. (9) The man does not really love you and he is one you should avoid utterly.

Adelle, Washburn, Wis.—The questions you ask about what you should do in the society of young men show that you are too young yet for such society. (2) You can only break yourself from using slang by thinking before you speak.

Winter Rose, Devonshire, Eng.—If you really do not care for the young man and cannot marry him, you should not accept any attention from him except as from the most ordinary acquaintance. Seeing him as you do is encouraging him whether you mean it so or not.

Leonore, St. Louis, Mo .- Sixteen is at least four years too young to become engaged. Your half dozen questions, which I do not answer, would in-dicate that. Wait a little and watch the world.

ABSENT-MINDED HESEKI' SHAW.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

The heedlessest critter that I ever saw.
As numb-skulled as tophet, was Heseki' Shaw.
Was always forgettin' what he was about!
We people 'round town kind o' thought he was "out".

He always was doin' some back-ended trick: One time when he wanted to break off a stick,
He laid it right over the mouth of the well
And jumped on the middle; it broke and he fell!
'Twas lucky that some of the neighbors were 'round

Or the tom-swatted fool would 'a' sartin been drowned drowned.

Walked out of a second floor window on air,

—Was intendin' to build a pi-azzy roof there—
Forgot till he flammed on the ground nearly kilt
That the roof was jest notion and hadn't been built,
Was mendin' a stall in the linter one day
And was poundin' and bangin' and nailin' away,
When all of a sudden the fust thing he knew Whang-bang, through the side of the tie-up he flew.

He somehow or other was tryin' to nail To the wall of the linter a cow's wigglin' tail. Said later he thought 'twas a battening strip, But he knowed that it wa'n't when she fetched him that clip.

A feller was down on the road haulin' freight
And he came across Shaw who had held up to bait.
That critter was thinkin' and munchin' away.
His eyes off on space and his mouth full of hay, While the hosses stood droolin' as hungry as crows, With doughnuts and biskits spread under their Wal, that was the style of the dough-head, I swan!

—Absentest mindedest sort of a man!

Never staid 'round with the gang at the store, 'D ruther set off by himself; and he'd more

Thund'rin' old papers and tinker-sculch 'round Than a hoss with a windlass could h'ist off the ground.

So he doddered 'round home till he wore his folks
out:

out: But I guess they'd 'a' kept him his life time, 'thout doubt, doubt,

If, once when the minister called at the house,
He hadn't stirred up such a terrible touse.
His father'n the elder were waitin' for tea
And were talkin' away jest as busy's could be, Hesekiah stubbed in with a light in his hand

—He's the one of the Shaws that has got all the fame.

It was this way, you see: Heseki' all them years

While he stubbed around daffy was thinkin' up gears

And patent contraptions so handy and slick

That later the mill-man grabbed onto them quick.

But Ase was the feller! You see, Heseki'

Stubbed 'er up to the city, looked 'round, made a try.

Got the mill-folks excited and then of course he Went to schemin' and plannin' as hard as could be. —Walked 'round in a trance wusser'n ever, 'twas said,
With those gears and contrivances jammed in his head,
Then he blowed out the gas at the tavern, died there,

there,
And was taken back home in a box marked "With Care".
Then Ase took them patents—went at it in style,
And slick as a whistle he cleaned up his pile.
And the most of the world never heard of nor saw
The real chap who done it—that Heseki' Shaw.
For Ase scooped the name and the fame and the tin.

That's the way of the world, ye know, time, time

I was in at a seance soon after Hes died

And the meejum got word of him. Said he had To save his blamed soul couldn't tell who he was.

Meejum said he was sittin' there outside the gate —And he's sittin' there yet—got to loaf 'round and wait

Till some one from this way, who's knowin' the same, Comes past so's to tell him his town and his name.

A printing and binding machine, which is operated by one man, and is nothing short of a marvel, printing, folding, cutting, counting, binding, and delivering a complete book at the thousands of copies per this hour, has caused this panie in the book trade, and enabled the publishers of Comport to offer their subscribers practically free a book which has heretofore sold at $6.00. This is the first American edition of this standard work, Wood's Natural History, which is known wherever the English language is spoken, contains 800 pages, 500 illustrations, abounds in charming descriptions of all the animals, domestic and wild, of every country on the face of the globe, and promises to outrival popularity Uncle Tom's Cabin, as well as every other book ever published, the Bible,

A Lioness for Breakfast!

"A small herd of zebras was quietly feeding on a plain, all unconscious of the stealthy approach of several lions, which were creeping towards them in regular order, under cover of a dense reed thicket. So quietly did the lions make their advance that their progress was unnoticed even by the zebra-sentinel. The lions crept on, until they reached the thicket, when the sentinel took the a.arm. It was too late—with a single bound, the leading lion sprang over the reeds, felled one of the zebras, and set the otners scampering so as to fall an easy prey to his companions."

"Early one morning, one of our herdsmen announced that a lion was devouring a lioness, only her skull, the larger bones, and the skin were left. On expmining the ground more closely, the fresh remains of a young spring-bok were also discovered. We therefore conjectured that the lion and lioness, being very hungry, and the antelope not proving a sufficient meal for both, had quarrelied; and he, after killing his wife, had coolly eaten her also."

This is from page 136. Every one of the book's 500 ciliustrations is by an eminent artist, and the facts contained on every one of its 800 pages would be cheap at one dollar each, having cost more than a hundred times that sum.

The clear and descriptive text of the writer is embellished with engravings by such eminent Artists as WOLF, WEIS, COLE-

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE Sun touches the first point of the celestial sign Aries this year at about 9 minutes past 8 o'clock in the morning of the 21st of March, Washington Mean Time, when a new Astrological year begins. A figure of the heavens erected for that moment of time shows Satured in the heavens erected for that moment of time shows Satured in the 10th house. Satured in the 10th house in the 10th house, only a few degrees removed from the great benefic Jupiter which is also powerfully placed in the 10th house. Mercury is in the 11th house; Herschel is in the 8th; the Moon in the 5th; and Neptune in the 2nd house. At the moment the Sun crosses the line it will be just upon the cusp of the 12th house and nearly conjoined with the fiery Mars.

Venus being ruler of the scheme and placed in the 10th house, indicates, as the Astrological authorities tell us, that "Men shall be in a happy and prosperous condition; that the year shall be successful and plentiful; that joy and gladness will be occasioned by the ruler and superiors; that the year will be successful and advantageous unto women who shall be free generally from infirmities and mischances; and that the people shall delight themselves in recreations, sports and feastings."

One element of mischief is observable in the figure's indications. Saturn's closeness to the meri-ties and mischances; and that the people shall delight themselves in recreations, sports and feastings."

One element of mischief is observable in the figure's indications. Saturn's closeness to the meridian together with the near conjunction of Mars to the Sun on the 12th cusp, cautions the Chief Executive of the Nation against treacherous machinations of pretended political friends and invites unusual care in the handling of fire-arms and in all indulgencies in sports and pastimes. True, the presence of both the benefics in the 10th house contests the mischief and may prevent serious harm, but it will be wise to exercise prudence and caution in the particulars pointed out.

It is apprehended that the fiery Mars will cause some bad fires in the latter days of March and June, this year, in some hotel, school, or place of entertainment or amusement. The fire losses in the city of Philadelphia are likely to be greater or more disastrous than usual and the fire authorities there should be more than usually vigilant. At the time of this Ingress, seven of the heavenly bodies will be above the earth and the figure is a strong one in promises of general advancement of the country's interests and the welfare of the whole nation.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR MARCH, 1902. MARCH I—Naturday. The month opens with an excellent day for the transaction of all honorable business. Use the middle hours of the day for replenishing thy stock in trade and for dealings with bankers, brokers, judges, ecclesiastics and persons of wealth and means; seek money accommodations, make collections, and adjust accounts.

2-Sunday. Be master of thy tongue during the middle hours of this day or quarrels and unpleasantness come; the time is excitable and hasty words and acts should be avoided; let no offence be given to persons in authority in any walk in life; the evening is the best part of the day, particularly for social conversations and polite religious entertainment.

on the day, particularly for social conversations and politic religious entertainment.

3-Monday. Actively pursue all engagements relating to the world of letters; deal with printers, booksellers, mathematicians, accountants, lecturers, auctioneers, lawyers, commercial travellers and clerks in trade; do important correspondence and attend to all educational enterprises; hire servants and travel.

4-Tuesday. Deal with public officers and persons in places of trust and confidence; seek favors from thine employer or from persons in authority.

5-Wednesday. The first half of this day contributes unusual energy and enterprise and invites activity in all the walks of life, but especially for the machinist, engineer, manufacturer and trader in machinery and mechanical and chemical appliances of all kinds; deal in metals, cattle, hardware, fire-arms and chemicals and drugs; but as the afternoon advances baffing conditions prevail likely to hinder the progress of enterprise or deny satisfactory results in new matters then begun; have no transactions relating to houses or lands or their improvement.

6-Thursday. The first two-thirds of the day are 6—Thursday. The first two-thirds of the day are not to be depended upon for gain or progress in the general affairs of life, being likely to present features of controversy or opposition in efforts then put forth; the late afternoon and evening are, however, highly commended and promise favorable results to all honorable undertakings; attend to money matters and solicit financial advantages as the day draws to its close.

7—Friday. A superior day for all the literary under-

7-Friday. A superior day for all the literary undertakings and the elegant pursuits; poetical, musical and dramatical works are favored; social affairs and all entertainments that please have happy results at this time; favorable for copyrights, trademarks, patents, printing, and correspondence; write letters to public officers and government employees and generally crowd all mental efforts especially those pertaining to the politic arts and the decorative works of life.

9—Sunday. The mind will be inclined towards the elegant in literature and the imagination will be active; there are but few conditions, however, which conduce to religious fervor or excitement.

10—Monday. Disputes are likely to mar the events of the morning and forenoon unless the tongue be held well under control, particularly in the lives of persons born about the 18th of March or June, or the 14th of September or December, of past years. Such persons are likely to be in some considerable excitement, with disagreement or controversies in their affairs, or to be affected in matters of health, according to the part of the day in which born. All such will be wise to be patient under existing difficulties, practicing moderation and prudence under all circumstances; the noon hours of this day are to be preferred over the others for attending to any business concerned with houses or lands or mines or mining rights.

11—Tuesday. Actively pursue thy several avocations during all of this day, giving preference to the forencon for the transaction of business with banks or wealthy persons and for purchases of goods to be sold again; mental efforts are not likely to be very satisfactory or the literary labors as effective during the forencon; the afterncon and evening encourage all the artistic works and promise happy results for all social gatherings and general amusement.

12—Wednesday. The noon hours are rather baffling and disappointing and forbid the bargaining for houses or lands or any agricultural products or advantages; the morning hours should be used for urging correspondence and all literary work of consequence. The time is quite unfavorable for persons born as indicated in the 10th paragraph and they are invited to exercise unusual caution in all their undertakings; they should not now sever business connections nor enter upon any new enterprise at this time in their life; married ladies, so born, are likely to be now suffering from the misfortune or misconduct of their marital partners or from their male relatives and they are cautioned to be very discreet and prudent in all they do or say or more than usual unhappiness will result; influences will disrupt many betrothal bonds and cause sadness and regret unless great care is exercised.

13—Thursday. Do not choose this day for buying goods to sell again; speculators should refrain from ventures if they would avoid losses; begin nothing of importance; make no contracts especially about houses and lands: be careful of drawing thy purse-strings and attach but little significance to verbal promises to pay.

attach but little significance to verbal promises to pay.

14—Friday. An excellent day for the general undertakings of life, though the literary avocations and contract-writing are adversely affected; postpone engagements with artists, mathematicians, press-writers and scholars; bargain for lands and houses; make arrangements for improvement of real estate, and deal with aged persons, the agricultural classes and manufacturers and mechanics; surgical operations and chemical experiments will in general succeed; consult thy dentist; trade in cattle, machinery, hardware and cutlery.

15—Saturday. Very favorable for the major enter-prises of life in the forenoon of this day; make pur-chases for trade and speculate in stocks and securities, although in this extraordinary method of money getting the nativity should be more directly relied upon; and seek favors and money accommodations.

16—Sunday. Avoid the society of eccentric persons and do not engage the mind in metaphysical discussions or antiquarian researches; peculiarity of sentiment and oddness of expression will mark the pulpit discourse of the day, especially where the utterances are extemporaneous in character.

17—Monday. This day improves as it advances; urge all important matters pertaining to houses, lands, mines, or their products and to agriculture during the middle hours of the day; purchase lumber, coal, wood, farm products and farming implements, and crowd all the routine matters in life.

18—Tuesday. Defer thy correspondence of the morning until the middle hours of the day; but have care in all thou shalt do in the afternoon and evening when baffling circumstances arise that defeat success or give disappointment.

19—Wednesday. During the forenoon let every energy be given to the prosecution of business with manufacturers, mechanics and all in charge of great public works of construction; consult thy dentist; engage in surgery, experiment in chemistry, trade in cattle or metals; seek favor from executive authorities in city, state or nation; keep a firm hold upon the purse strings as the afternoon advances making purchases only to meet peremptory demands and refusing to obligate thyself in money matters.

20—Thursday. On this day the patience is shortend self in money matters.

20—Thursday. On this day the patience is short and the combative principle in man is peculiarly active and disputes and contention easily arise; seek no favor from public officers nor from persons having authority over thee; the afternoon and evening are poor for musical and artistic matters and do not encourage the purchase of dress or fancy goods or articles of decoration; the evening is peculiarly unfavorable for musical and artistic conversations or executions; avoid the fair sex and beware of unusual indulgencies of palate or appetite.

21—Friday. Hyperthing

21-Friday. Urge thine engagements of this day most vigorously during the forenoon, but merchants should transact business very cautiously during the afternoon; avoiding if possible the signing of any contract, note or other important writing and postponing correspondence concerning matters of magnitude; it will be well for all, in the absence of more definite information, to exercise the greatest care during these coming two or three weeks, and especially on the particular days hereinafter indicated for the avoidance of bad firer, explosions and accidents from the brute creation and from machinery and chemicals, as conditions conspire to increase inflammation, excitement, combustion and chemical activity, and more than usual physical harm and property loss is threatened.

22-Saturday. This day invites the prosecution of artistic and musical labors and promises pleasure and enjoyment from social gatherings and from musical and dramatical entertainments.

"3-Sunday. There is but little promise of good from this day, especially of assistance to the clergy, those connected with the church or from matters generally of an ecclesiastical nature; fires in churches should be carefully watched. The noon of this day inaugurates a very malevolent train of influences covering 24 hours in which fires and explosions will be more frequent than usual and are likely to be very destructive and attended with unusual money losses; let all have care in this respect.

with unusual money losses; let all have care in this respect.

24—Monday. The morning is treacherous and excitable but as the noon is passed, conditions invite full activity in business matters; make purchases for trade and push dealings with banks and persons of means and prominence; urge collections and seek money favors and accommodations; keep out of disputes in the morning, nor be in haste to enter into new engagements.

25—Tuesday. This day favors all manner of engagements in connection with strange and uncommon subjects, promoting metaphysical discourse and antiquarian researches; the first two-thirds of the day promotes success in the elegant avocations and encourages all engagements connected with the fine arts; consult thy tailor, dressmaker, milliner and all whose avocations aim at pleasing or gratifying mankind; the evening is unfortunate and cautions against making any kind of a contract concerning real estate or building.

26—Wednesday. Diligently use the first part of this day for the most important duties, particularly those connected with literary enterprises or with persons engaged in educational matters or in any of the literary walks in life; look carefully to the purse in the afternoon; loan no money and gauge thine expenditures by thine actual needs; do not make purchases of stock for trade nor bind thyself as surety for others.

27—Thursday. Urge all general routine matters and pursuits during the forenoon, but apply not for favor to thy superior in employment nor to persons in official stations in the latter part of the day when conditions are likewise adverse for paying court to the fair sex of for seeking pleasure in social or dramatic circles; cautionary signals are due here for the evening and night hours.

28—Friday. An excellent day for pursuits in connection with agriculture and for engaging with landlords and in all matters pertaining to lands and houses; deal in such commodities as coal, iron, petroleum, wood, lumber, lead, wool and grain and, with discretion, in mining and railway stocks, if thy nativity likewise favor; make contracts for building and repairing and deal with machinists, engineers, miners, and also persons in all fiduciary capacities.

Be early astir, for the morning hours are golden especially for commercial men, woolendealers, clergymen. and bankers; choose the very early forenoon for buying merchandise for trade and transacting business with chemists, surgeons, bakers, iron and brass workers and carpenters; do no important correspondence nor hire or purchase lands or houses in the afternoon or evening, when no papers of consequence should be executed; mental labors are less effective and literary productions less satisfactory during the last half of this day.

S-Saturday. Urge all honorable pursuits to the utmost during the forenoon hours, as the afternoon is less promising of good results.

S-Saturday. Rather a contentious Sabbath day, likely to invite aggressive pulpit discourse and theological debate and controversy also quarrels and disnatanong persons in the same promise of t likely to invite aggressive pulpit discourse and theological debate and controversy also quarrels and fisputes among persons in the mechanical trades; let all be quarded in the handling or care of fire, hot liquids, and chemicals and avoid accidents from such sources as well as from steam and electricity. These suggestions are particularly appropriate for persons born on or about the 12th or 30th of March, 1st of July, 14th of September, 3rd of October, or 29th of December, of past years; for such persons are now likely to be physically and mentally feverish and excitable; oversensitive in feeling; in the midst of controversy or contention; peculiarly rash in thought, deed, or act; and should especially avoid travel or otherwise placing themselves in the way of harm or loss from accident or of danger from eruptive and inflammatory troubles; all excitement should be shunned particularly by such of these as recognize themselves to be constitutionally liable to apoplectic troubles.

STOPS NEURALGIC PAINS INSTANTLY.

Neuralgia is caused by the blood being impure, resulting in the impairment of the nervous system. The lack of nerve force brings a contraction of the nerve centers which is certain to cause the most intense pain. Unless the blood is at once purified and the system placed in a healthy condition it invariably terminates in a complete break-down of the whole nervous system and often means years of terrible suffering. "5-DROPS" will give quick relief and effect a permanent cure of this dreadful malady. It cleanses the blood, starts perfect circulation, stops the pain, and in a remarkably short time restores the nerves to a normal condition. No other remedy in the world will revitalize the nerve centers or give such instant relief to the sufferer.

The Cherokees, Iowas, Kickapoos, Pottawatomies, Cheyennes, Arrapahoes, Creeks and Seminoles, the aborigines of that part of the United States, were the inhabitants. The Indian Territory had been set apart by the federal government as permanent reservation for peaceful Indians. This king of animal life in the northland is not only the largest living bear, but differs markedly from all other American specie. It closely resembles the great brown bear of Kamschatka, but exceeds it in size. It is known that these bears subsist largely on berries which grow in abundance on Kadiak Islard and on the fish which they can claw out of the shallow streams literally overcrowded with finny inhabitants.

The Episode of Love's Ambassador. Being Enjande Number 2.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

[Capt. Skote Gregg, skipper of a coasting packet drops into Newport Harbor on one of his trips and visits his cousins. During the evening he meets one of their neighbors, a fascinating widow, who seems considerably impressed by the honest mariner. The skipper is a bachelor, but he has been engaged for more than thirty years to a spinster down at his home, a patient woman who has resolved that she will care for her old parents so long as they live, and will not marry. Several months after meeting the widow the skipper stops again at Newport and shows the amiable woman so much attention that his cousin's wife—staunchly devoted to the carlier attachment of the skipper—vows that she will write home and teil all about his foolishness if he doesn't remember his vows. But the skipper is smitten hard and on his next trip determines to stop at Newport and see t'e widow by stealth, even though she lives next door to his cousin. The crew and cook of the schooner—all comprised in one boy—is much offended at this decision of the skipper who hints that he may remain several days. The "crew" is impatient to get home to his own love, and the notion of delay tortures him. He rebels when the skipper dorders him on shore to do an errand, but by threats the captain obliges him to do his bidding. They lower the yawl over the side and the "crew" rows the love-sick skipper to the Newport dock.]

EVENING sky was purple and a paring of moon hung in the west. Skipper Skote Gregg leaned back in the yawl's stern, straddling his legs so that the swashing bilge water wouldn't wet his Sunday best trousers. He looked up at the moon and at the stars thrusting through the mellow haze and felt romantic. People usually feel romantic when they are at Newport.

"Beautiful ev'nin', hain't it, Seth?" murmured the skipper.

"Good enough," growled Seth, who was rowing stolidly. He was thinking how this evenem if he were dow in Hobbs Harbor, looking out across the trail of the moon on the sea and then looking into the Sims girl's bright eyes. He gritted his teeth at the reflection.

"How long do ye p'tend ye're goin' to stay here this trip?" asked Seth, finding it difficult to speak to the skipper without swearing at him. The captain pushed the pasteboard frame of his made-up bow more firmly up under his collar and said calmly:

"It sort of depends, Seth."

"I should think ye'd be in some hurry to git this cargo back home," urged Seth. "You know when we sailed for York, Burkett said he was most out of flour and bran middlin's."

"Wal, flour and bran middlin's hain't the only thing there is in this world, Seth," remarked the skipper dreamily.

"And the Susan P. Gregg won't be the only packet on between Hobbs Harbor and New York unless we git round some time 'ruther with the things people are waitin' for." Seth's tone was distinctly indignant.

"Look here, ye freckled young shrimp," roared the skipper, "are ye tryin' to boss me 'round? I'll throw ye overboord in about ha'f jiffy."

Seth pulled at his oars and made no reply.

"What do you mean by bracin' up to me in such a sassy way?" demanded Capt. Skote.

"I was only sayin' what I thought," said the boy. "It's more for your good than mine. Longer ye be on the way the more pay I git. But 'tain't the same way with the folks who are waitin' for goods."

"Yas, I know about who it is that's waiting for goods 't you're thinkin' about," said the skipper drily. "There's a bale of live yeal that's consigned to the Sims girl that ye're thinkin' about mostly. That veal will reach her in damaged condition if ye hain't more careful about how ye talk back to me."

There was silence. Seth had no reply. The skipper after a little pause went on.

"I see ye are pretty ugly and set about this matter, Seth and perhaps ye are thinkin' that when ye git back to Hobbs Harbor ye will blow the thing out of revenge. Are ye thinkin' that, Seth?"

"I hain't thought nothin' about it," replied Seth sullenly.

"I know ye've got it in your mind," said the skipper, "and ye're mad enough to shoot your mouth off-I know that. I've offered to help you along in your matter all friendly like and I'll do it, Seth. But if ye play me dirty I'll do the same for you and when I start in ye'll wish ye hadn't."

They ran the yawl far up a dock between long wharves and scrambled to the plank walk that led to the street. They walked far up town in silence. The dark had come down and the skipper dodged the patches of light thrown by the street arc lamps. Finally Capt. Gregg halted by the corner of a shrubbery-bordered lawn. "Her house is the second one up that first street to the right," he explained to Seth. "I'm goin' to wait here.

"Now for your sailin' orders! Ye understand, Seth, that if my cousin's folks know I'm in the place or am callin' on the widder thev'll make a lot of trouble. They're messy folks, that's what they are. They want to run things in Hobbs Harbor jest the same's though they lived there yet.

"Now I want you to lay 'longside the widder's door and give her a hail for me. Find out if the coast's clear and if it is and she hain't got company from round the neighborhood that would be li'ble to blow on me, jest tell her that Cap'n Gregg will do himself the honor of callin' to pass the time of day. There! How's that sound?"

Seth started away without response. His face in the faint light from a distant lamp hung at the jaws as sulky as a bull-pup's visage.

"Hold on a minute," ordered the skipper. "In case it happens that any one else comes to the door and you can't see the widder don't let on who sent ye. There might have something happened in four months so that she hain't to home or somethin' else, ye never can tell what. I'll wait for ye at the end of this street, for I'll keep movin' so's not to attract suspicion."

Seth shambled away. "Now mind," cautioned the skipper huskily, "don't give away nothin' to any one except the widder."

He watched the youth until he had turned into the street he had indicated. He saw him turn up the path toward the house and then Cap. Gregg went scuffing down the dark street, at the head of which he had been standing. He was determined to observe all caution. Five minutes passed. His nerves were in a quiver of expectation that was almost apprehension. Who could tell what might have happened to the widow in four months?

She might be receiving attentions from some other man! The thought made his heart drop like the plummet lead. He blamed himself now because he had conducted his wooing so leisurely and in such an indefinite manner. He realized that a man who has been engaged to be married for thirty years is not likely to realize that Cupid has wings. He takes too much for granted. He has looked on woman as a landmark, always there every time the sun rises. That was the way with Sophy, his affianced who lived down in Hobbs Harbor. But a pretty widow living in a city full of young men was far from being Sophy Maxwell, whom all the bachelors of Hobbs Harbor tacitly avoided as one already disposed of. Furthermore, the widow had of course been told by that meddlesome cousin's wife that he was engaged and he had never hinted to the charming Belle in any way that his inclinations were drifting in another direction.

On all these things and others as harassing did the skipper ponder while he stood there in the shadows waiting for the return of his am-

All at once there was the rapid tchicktchick-tchick of running feet on the gravel of the walk. The skipper faced about and out of the gloom burst Seth fleeing like a rabbit.

"Run," he gasped and away he went. The skipper, sudden fear clutching his heart, coursed along behind. Occasionally he spurted up abreast Seth and hissed: "What is it?" But Seth only put on more speed and gasped again, "Run!"

In this way they made the dock, running in the dark places, jogging along in a trot when there were people to observe them. They tumbled into the yawl and Seth, floundering with the oars, cuffing gobs of sea-water up on-pull out into the harbor and head away for the dim smudge of the Susan.

At regular intervals the skipper still hissed his query at Seth. "What's the trouble?" But Seth had not deigned to reply. Now when they were half way out to the schooner the youth let out a mighty blurt of breath and crossing his oars under one arm wiped his forehead with a shaking forefinger.

"Woof!" he panted, "I'm plumb beat out." "What in sanup's the matter, Seth?" croaked the skipper.

"Hah-h-h!" puffed Seth. "That was the closest squeak I ever had in all my life." He stared back over the water behind them. "Ye don't hear anything as though any one was afollowin' us, do ye?" he said to the captain.

"I don't hear anything," replied the skipper looking around apprehensively. "But what's the matter with ye, anyway?"

"Ye see I went up to the door," Seth commenced.

"Yes-yes-go on!"

"I rung the bell." "Yes!"

"A man came to the door!"

"A man!"

"Yas, that's it-a man."

"'What's wanted?" says he.

"'I want to speak to the Widder Belle Foster," savs I.

"'Hain't no sech woman here,' says he. Then he grinned-say, he looked seven feet high, that man did-and he had a red face and his voice sounded like a coffee mill. Wal, he smiled and says he. 'She hain't Widder Foster now-she's my wife. If ye want to see her step in.'

"'No thank ye,' says I, 'I've got to be goin'. I guess there hain't no need to see her.'

"Married!" gurgled the skipper, "married!" "That's it!" Seth replied cheerfully.

"What a blasted fool a man is to put his dependence on a woman," groaned the skipper.

Seth resumed. "Wal, that man he says, 'I guess not-!' he says after me. 'What did ye come here after, anyway?' 'Nothin',' says I. 'Ye lie,' says he. 'Nothin' much,' says I. Aw, say, he was the biggest man I ever see. He grabbed me by the neck and he jammed me right down on the door steps. 'Own up,' says he, 'who sent ye? If you don't I'll-'and he gritted his teeth at me.

"Did ye-did-" the skipper stammered, aghast.

"It sort of come right out of me before I thought," moaned Seth. "I couldn't help it." The skipper raised a loose boat seat and glared at Seth as he brandished the weapon. "I'm a good mind to kill ye," roared Gregg.

"He scart me so I couldn't help it-ye hadn't ought to have sent me," Seth whined. "I hain't good at bluffin', and ye know it. Wal, when I said who sent me and that he was down the street, the big man dropped me and started into the house for his hat and revolver, so he said. And I run. When I turned the corner he was jest comin' out on the jump. He was after you. He knows who you be. I shouldn't wonder if he come out here to the schooner." Again Seth bent to the oars.

The skipper seemed to think that Newport harbor wasn't safe for him. As soon as they were aboard he ordered Seth to the windlass. The anchor was tripped and ten minutes later the Susan was drifting down with the tide.

All the next day and the next and the next the skipper stood at the wheel and varied his sulphurous comments on Seth's "dum foolishness," with laments on the fickleness of woman. Now that the widow was gone from him he seemed to have the idea that somehow or other she had been promised to him and was his property-such is the unreasonableness of a man in love. Seth maintained silence.

When the Susan drew near the home port the skipper, softened by thoughts of home, seemed to forget his rancor at the manner in which Seth had betrayed him to the new husband. He admitted to Seth that perhaps he had done the best he knew how. Then he made up for the concession by launching into new invective against the widow.

They had sighted the Nubble lighthouse and were well in toward Hobbs Harbor one afternoon when Seth interrupted the skipper's monotonous oration on the subject of false woman. Gregg had finally reached a point where he declared the unalterable opinion that a man couldn't trust any woman. For his part, he said, he was glad that the widow had got married because now he was safe from her deceit. He had found her out in time.

"She would probably have fooled you latter on, anyway," suggested Seth.

"Them kind of women is bound to," said the skipper.

"Hain't ye a bit sorry ye've got red of her?"

"No, sir," cried the skipper. "I consider it an act of Providence that I didn't git tangled up with her. I kind of lost my head there for a little but I'm over it now."

"Ye never'll be sorry ye didn't git her?" persisted Seth.

"Never," said the skipper, "and so ye don't want to ever say anything round here about the matter, nohow."

"You bet I won't," agreed Seth. "I hain't that kind. But say, Cap. Gregg, I'm awful to the skipper in his excitement, managed to glad to hear you say that ye're glad ye hain't the idea that city women wasn't fit for wives. I reckoned ye'd be sorry some time. Now I'll claim the credit of gittin' ye out of the scrape."

"Ye will, hey?" demanded the skipper, looking at Seth with wonder in his eyes.

"Huh huh!" smiled Seth, jerking his clin down.

"What do ye mean?"

"Now that ye say ye're glad it's over and you are out of the trap that woman set for ye, I'll own up. There wa'n't any man there that night!"

"What!!"

"Naw, wa'n't no man there. I didn't knock on the door at all."

"How did ye happen not to?" asked the skipper with strange quiet in his tones.

"When ye said ye hadn't heard from her for four months it put an idea into my head."confessed Seth. "I jest made it all up. So I claim the credit of gittin' ye out of the scrape." He looked at the skipper for applause.

The skipper made the wheel of the Susan fast with two half hitches. Then he rolled his sleeves above his elbows, grabbed a knotted piece of painter rope and advanced toward Seth with a menace in his white face that the cook and crew had never seen there before.

"Wuh-wuh-what ye goin' to do?" gasped

"I'm goin to kill ye right here in sight of home," grated the skipper.

"But ye said ye was glad ye was out of it," blubbered Seth.

"Jim swat your hide to tophet," roared the skipper, "you'll drive me ravin', distracted. Jest as soon's I've killed ye I shall give myself up to the authorities. They'll acquit me after I tell 'em my story—I hain't a feard of that."

He dashed on the youth. But Seth with a yell of terror leaped into the mainmast shrouds and clambered up the ratlines. The skipper pursued him to the trees. But the nimbler and younger man shinned the topmast until he was out of reach. There he clung turnings frightened face at the skipper raving below. But the Susan's head began to pay off and the captain was obliged to scurry back to the wheel to prevent the old craft from bowling into the Nubble Ledge. From there on into the harbor the exigencies of navigation were such that Gregg had no opportunity to attempt the capture of Seth. The latter sat disconsolately on the cross trees listening to the reviling threats of the skipper who yelled a new proposition for punishment at him every time the wneel was twirled.

When the Susan hove to off the wharf the loungers noted with surprise that the skipper dropped his own anchor and let run the sheets and braces himself while the crew, the cook and the first mate dangled his feet from the cross-trees.

The rumor of this singular spectacle spread up into the village and while the skipper was engaged in furling sails the folks commenced to saunter down the wharf to discover what was the trouble on board the Susan P. Gregg just in port from York city.

A Story of Easter.

murmur of talk which filled the church gallery while the members of the choir waited for the Easter rehearsal to begin suddenly hushed.

Annette Harbor ough had just entered the church below, and was coming toward the stairs that led up into the gallerv.

Each person in the choir looked at somebody else, and wondered what would happen when Annette reached the gallery and found Gertrude Wright sitting in the first soprano's seat. Even the organist, running over the accompaniment to an anthem, lost her place and played two notes wrong.

For the last two years the church in Center Applefield had been twisted and torn by dissensions in its choir, just as one of the trees for which the town was named might have been twisted and torn by a hurricane.

The minister, good man, to whom fortunately both factions declared themselves devotedly attached, had gone to bed more than once made sick at heart and body by the quarrel. "They'll be the death of me yet, I really do believe," he sighed one day as his wife bound hot cloths around his aching head.

"It's a pity," she answered, giving utterance in the privacy of their bedroom to feelings long repressed in public, "that they can't get up their voices as easy as they do their backs. We'd have wonderful singing if they did."

Annette Harborough had been the church's first soprano for years. So many years, in fact, that if she had been a less well-to-do woman folks would have called her an old maid. Being that she was the richest woman in town they said, "Annette's getting along in years."

The choir in Center Applefield of course was an unsalaried one. People sang in it from love of the church-some of them. Others sang for honor, and the opportunity which sitting up in the high old-fashioned gallery gave them to look down on their less distinguished relations sitting in the news below. Probably Annette Harborough would have said that the first of these was the consideration that influenced her, and would have been honestly unconscious how much the latter entered into the matter. To the childless, unconsciously lonely woman, living in the big old Harborough house, her music-especially her church music -had come to be her chief interest in life, an interest deeper and more intense than even her most intimate friends-or she herself, for that matter-realized. Her voice, not particularly strong, but singularly pure and high, had dominated the other voices in the choir just as her will and wishes had overruled those of the other singers. Through all these years she had set in the front seat at the right hand of the middle of the gallery, the dividing line between the sopranos, and, between them, the basses and the tenors.

Until two years before that she had never had a suggestion of a rival, and then the rival had come from a quarter in which she would never have looked for one, for to women of thirty-or older, some said-girls of seventeen are only little girls.

Gertrude Wright had been a pretty little girl with a fresh, childish voice. Annette herself had suggested that she be taken into the choir. Looking back, now, she felt this fact to be an added grievance. At seventeen, Gertrude was a beautiful woman, with a voice stronger than Annette's, if not so sweet and high.

There were some, too, who said that the hoir's leader did not always sing true, now. Only that Sunday morning they had been talking of that in the choir, with reference to an earlier rehearsal of the Easter music.

"Where the soprano goes up, there, on 'Christ the Lord is risen on high,' she certainly did flat," the organist said, playing over the strain as she spoke. "She sang that 'high,' half a note too low."

"Probably she wanted to play high, low, -" began John Amidon, who sang bass; but the organist, who was a woman with a strong sense of the propriety of things, cut him off short with-

"John Amidon! You stop! Don't you know you are in the meeting house?"

John Amidon was a young man. What was more, he was very much in love with Gertrude Wright, and did not care who knew it.

What made the trouble so serious for the church was that Deacon Wright, Gertrude's father, was the richest man in town, just as Annette was the richest woman. The two together paid a good half of all the church expenses, and the rest of the society realized that if either became hopelessly estranged it meant that they themselves must go down into their own pockets to make up the loss. Deacon Wright openly asserted that his daughter, now nineteen and radiant in all the glory of young womanhood's strength and vitality, was the best singer in the choir, and ought to have the first place. "Annette Harborough's too old to sing," he declared.

More than one church meeting called for other purposes had ended by dividing over this question. So far the Harborough faction had kept control of the music committee of the society, but at a meeting held the night before this rehearsal they had been, for the first time. outvoted. At this meeting the chairman of the committee had been instructed to notify Miss Wright that she was the choir leader and as such was to take the leading soprano's seat, and when the Sunday morning rehearsal came he had done so.

The gallery door opened and Annette stood in the doorway. The singers in their seats tried to think of something to talk about, and failed, and were dumb. Only the organist, who suddenly had found the notes before her so difficult that she was obliged to bend forward to read them, broke the silence with the organ's sound.

The gaze of the woman in the doorway traveled past the singers to her seat, and to the woman sitting in it. The place next it, the second place, was vacant.

"What does this mean?" she asked, facing the situation promptly. Her clear, high voice made every word distinctly heard above the organ.

The chairman of the music committee-one of the tenor singers-coughed and rose in his

The organist stopped playing.

"I have been instructed," the man said, getting the words out with difficulty, "to inform you, Miss Harborough, that the music committee of the society has voted that after this Miss Wright will be the leading soprano. A majority of the committee," he hastened to

The man sat down. "She never answered a word," he told his wife afterward, when he got home that day, "but she looked like death; and she just turned 'round and went down stairs, and out."

The choir watched the woman cross the church below them in silence. Folks in the congregation said the singing went lame that day, and those that did not know what had happened, wondered if Annette Harborough was sick that she was not there.

Long past midnight, one night, some weeks after Easter, people in Center Applefield, sleeping soundly, stirred in bed, sleepily wondered what was the matter, and then sprang wide awake to know that some one in the road outside was shouting "Fire!" and that the church bell was being rung furiously. Streaming out into the village, half dressed men and bareheaded women, they found that it was the church itself that was on fire, and that the bell clanging in the tower was ringing its own

There had been a church supper in the vestry that evening, and the fire had taken from the kitchen.

"Serves them just right," said an aged deacon's wife, as she brought out an armful of hymnbooks and laid them down on the pew cushions that her husband had brought out before her. "I've always said they'd no business to hitch a kitchen on to a meeting house.'

The bell had ceased. The rope had burned off, and the flames already were wrapping around the spire. The bell itself might fall at any minute. Everything movable had been brought out of the church, and the people could only stand about in the glare of the flames now and watch the building go. More than one was crying, for the old house of worship had grown fast into the lives of many there. Some were thinking of weddings and funerals which had taken place there, which had meant much to them.

Suddenly a woman screamed and pointed upward to the gallery window, from which the sash had been torn out.

Annette Harborough stood in the open space, grasping the window frame with one hand.

"Jump!" cried half a dozen men, running forward to stand beneath the window.

But while they were still too far away to have caught her if she had done as they had bid, the woman in the window fainted, let go her hold on the window frame, and sank back into the gallery of the burning building.

"Gertrude! Shall I go?"

In time, the interval that passed between the question and its answer could have been measured only by seconds, but it was long enough for John Amidon and the girl beside him to see again in memory the face of the woman that Sunday, as she had stood in the doorway of the gallery.

"Yes, John. Go."

Pulling the shawl from her shoulders she wrapped it around his head, bending forward as she did so to kiss him, regardless of who might see her.

A dozen voices shouted to the man to come back, and when he did not heed them, were hushed as their owners watched breathlessly to see if he came out again from the burning building into which he had rushed.

The entire structure was on fire now. At any moment the bell might fall, bringing down the spire with it; and the gallery was just beneath.

But the bell did not fall. At least not until after the young man had come back into the open air, bringing the senseless woman with him, and had laid her down upon a pile of cushions.

Afterward, when they were building the new church, and Annette Harborough gave three thousand dollars toward the expense, folks said the money must be a thank offering.

"She seems to have forgotten all about the trouble in the choir," they said, "and she sings again in meeting now just as hearty as anybody can." While the new church was being built the society held services in the town hall, and as there was no gallery there they had congregational singing.

In the fall the women of the society frequently gathered in the unfinished building to ew carpets, make pew cushions, and help the work along in similar feminine ways. One day Annette and Gertrude found themselves working side by side, and, for a moment, left alone in the vestry. They had never spoken since that spring day so long before.

The older woman looked hastily around to ee that no one could hear.

"You saved my life," she said, breathing short and quick. "I want to tell you that I wasn't worthy of it. I set the church on fire myself. I meant to burn up in it, I was so miserable, but at the last minute my courage failed me. I felt I was too wicked to die. Then after all, I would, wicked or not, if it hadn't been for you. I was crazy, I guess. Only you, who are young and have everything, didn't know what it meant for me to give up my singing. It was all I had in the world."

"I didn't then," the younger woman said, 'not at first. But when I saw you standing in the window that night, somehow I knew."

Then, just as she had kissed John Amidon that night in the fire's glare, she bent forward and kissed the woman working beside her.

They had meant to get into the new church for Christmas, but the furnaces were late in coming, and when they did come, Curt Aldrich, the only man in town who could set them, broke his leg, and what with one hindrance and another, the building was so long in being completed that the first service held in it was to be on Easter Sunday.

"Who'll sing the solo in the anthem?" asked the organist, when the subject of Easter music was brought up at a sewing circle.

"Annette," said Gertrude Wright promptly, Miss Harborough herself not being present.

"Is Annette going to sing again?" somebody

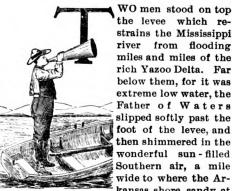

"Yes," said Gertrude, and then, blushing beautifully, she added, "she's promised to sing at my wedding, Easter week."

"Don't care if I do," his companion said, accepting the proffered favor. "You asked about that boat. A show boat's a sort of floating theatre. You'll see what they're like when this one gets down here. She'll tie up to the bank right about where we are, I reckon. There's quite a lot of them on the river. Some of them run up the Red River. They're really two boats, you'll see. The one behind furnishes the power, and is a sort of hotel in which the performers and all the rest of them live. The boat on ahead is the theatre, with a stage in one end, and seats—two tiers of them. This one coming will seat a thousand persons. She's one of the biggest on the river. It's an opera company she carries, good folks, too, some of them. Jim Remshaw's owned her only a couple of years. He bought her when old man Syms, who has been in the business for years, and the business tray wheel behind the rear boat.

The floating theater was near the town now, and the huge stern wheel behind the rear boat churned the yellow water into foam as it answered the signals of the man in the pilot house who was laboring to get the unwieldy craft up to the shore. The sound—one could hardly call it music—of a vociferous steam calliope on board which served to announce the show's arrival, called a good share of the town's population, white and black, to the top of the levee.

"James Y. Remshaw." The name was paint-

"Do you know that man—Remshaw?" the doctor asked of his companion.

"Some," was the laconic answer.

"Is he a native of these parts, do you know, or where did he come from?"

"He wasn't raised in these parts. I don't know where he came from," the river man answered; and then added a moment later with a sudden, repressed fury which made the man at his side, turn to look closely at him, "straight from hell, I reckon.

"You're a stranger to me," he said fiercely, as if in answer to the question in the other man's face, "but you're a doctor, and I never saw a good doctor yet that couldn't be trusted with other folks' troubles. I'm jest dead with the misery that's in me. There's a woman on board that boat—a good woman, too—that I love better than my life itself; and she used to love me until that man came between us. I believe she loves me yet in her heart only she love better than my life itself; and she used to love me until that man came between us. I believe she loves me yet, in her heart, only she don't know it when he's 'round, he's got such a hold on her. She's acting and singing in one of the plays they give and he lets her think she's going to make a strike that way, but she isn't. She's no genius. I know that if I do love her. She's just a handsome woman, and a good woman, yet—God knows how long, though, if she can't be made to see what he is. "What made you ask about him?" he said suddenly. "Do you know anything about him?"

"If he is the man I think he is," the doctor answered, "I know he has a wife in New York, whom he deserted three years ago, when she was sick in a hospital there."
The blood left the riverman's bronzed face, until it seemed as if the coat of tan upon it was painted over dead white marble.
"Stranger," he said, "if you have a wife, or a sweetheart, for the sake of the love you bear to them, help me save this woman. If she a sweetheart, for the sake of the love you bear to them, help me save this woman. If she knows what you know, I reckon she'll give him up, but if I just tell her she'll think I made up the story."

"It won't mean missing more than one train for you," he went on, "and it means missing my whole life if I lose her. I know it isn't an easy job I'm asking of you. If all the stories told about Jim Remshaw are true, he has killed a man for less than this."

"If this is the man I knew." said the doctor.

"If this is the man I knew," said the doctor, "he had no love for me when he last saw me, but I doubt if he would know me now, meeting me here. Tell me what you want me to do."

The two men talked earnestly for a few min

The two men talked earnestly for a few minutes, screened, as they supposed, by the sound of the calliope from any danger of the people near them hearing what they were saying.

"Will you do it?" the pilot asked, at last.

"Yes," said the doctor.

The two men climbed down from the levee and walked away in the direction of the town.

The auditorium of the floating theater was well filled at that night's performance. The doctor sat well back in the audience, and near the wall. The heavily bearded man who sat beside him would never have been identified with the man who had been with him on the levee that day, so well had his disguise been planned. Along in the middle of the first act a young woman came on the stage in a minor part.

"That's her," the riverman whispered hoarsely. What he had said of her was true. She was beautiful, but sing or act she could not. "There!" he added suddenly. "That's Remshaw at the side of the stage there, looking at her. Is he the man you know?"

"Yes," said his companion. "That is the

At the end of the first act the two men left the boat. Half an hour later they parted at the door of one of the saloons in the city, in which the pilot of the show boat was enjoying his lay off from duty. The man with the beard entered the saloon, and in no long time the two rivermen were drinking together.

At midnight, that night, Remshaw came up the gangplank on to the boat on which the troupe lived. He carried a small handbag with him. The show was over, the theater dark, and the actors gone to their rooms.

"Has Rast"—the pilot— "come on board yet?" Remshaw asked of a watchman who sat smoking at the head of the plank.

"No," said the man.

The owner of the showboat swore roundly.

"No," said the man.

The owner of the showboat swore roundly.

"He's drunk," he said. "I heard on shore he was 'most paralyzed in a saloon there an hour ago, and then went out. I've been looking for him but I can't find him." He sat down near the man, putting the bag down carefully beside him as he did so.

"Don't kick that bag," he said. "There's dynamite in it. The paper says the river's going to keep falling for the next few days anyway. If it gets much lower we'll likely have to blow out a snag or two somewhere, to

From out a group of loiterers at the bank, a bearded man came up the plank.
"Did I hear you all say you was short a pilot?" he asked.
"Looks like it. Why?"
"I'd like a job."
"Can you take these boats down the river in this water?"
"Yes, sir."
The man talked for a few minutes, and a trade was struck that the new-comer should go if the old pilot did not show up.
"What time do you want to start?" he asked.
"As soon as it is light enough for you to see to steer."

"What time do you want to start?" he asked.
"As soon as it is light enough for you to see to steer."

A few minutes later the new man came back up the plank, and another man with him—the doctor. "This here is a friend of mine," he said, "going to sit and smoke while we wait to see if your man comes."

"All right."

The two men sat down not far away. An hour later, Remshaw, still swearing at the pilot, gave up watching for him, and locking the bag of dynamite safely into a cupboard in his own stateroom, turned in.

"Where did you leave the pilot?" the doctor asked, when the two men were alone.

"Behind an empty house on the further side of the town. I had to drag him the last part of the way to get him there. The powder you gave me for him certainly did its work all right. He won't come out of it, you say, before noon, and he can't get any train down the river after that until the next morning. I reckon his place will be vacant for him again by that time," he added grimly.

Dawn came, and then daylight, and then sunrise. The show boat had been on her way down the river for two hours. Except for the men in the engine room and the pilot house, every one on board slept. Not every one, though, for the pilot had bribed a black woman hired to watch while the members of the troupe were asleep, to rouse the woman whom he loved and bring her to him. Stripped of his disguise, honest and manly, and in the fresh sunlight looking as handsome as a bronze statue, he pleaded his cause with her—pleaded, and won.

"He'll shoot you, Will," she faltered, "shoot we be the probaging and the room and the probaging and the probaging the probagin

"He'll shoot you, Will," she faltered, "shoot us both, perhaps, just as soon as he sees you on board."

"He won't see me on board," was the answer. "See that place down there where the water ripples just a bit," pointing down the river. "That's the place I've been watching for ever since supply."

"That's the place I've been watching for ever since sun-up.
"You two slip down quietly on this side the boat to where a row boat is dragging, and get into the boat, and wait for me. Take this with you, doctor," handing the latter the pilot's megaphone. "You'll find a loaded rifle in the boat. I put it there last night, when I let the other boat go adrift."

Five minutes later the pilot joined the man and women in the skiff, and casting the boat adrift pushed her out into the current just as the forward one of the two big boats drove full speed upon a sand bar in the middle of the

The coatless, vestless, hatless man who had fired the revolver disappeared suddenly from the deck of the show boat.

"He's gone to move his dynamite to some other place," the riverman chuckled. "He'll find the cupboard locked. The key's in my pocket. He won't be likely to break the door open by force very carelessly. By the time he gets back, I reckon we'll be out of range.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTER. Squire Todd, widower for a number of years, decides to marry Widow Jetts. Miss Trundy, who has been the squire's housekeeper since his wife's death, is notified and volunteers to leave. The squire tells her he shall give her five hundred dollars, but she says she doesn't need it and will not take it.

ARRANGED, a few days before the wedding Miss Trundy bade good bye to the old house where she had labored so many years and moved her possessions to a cozy little cottage down the street.

She was really happy after she was well settled. No longer had she the care of a family on her mind. She was free to go and come as she liked.

There was no worry about her modest future. On their part the Squire and his bride seemed to be as well satisfied and settled. Such all 'round happiness was too much for the village. The matter was discussed in its various phases at the regular meeting of the Current Events club, and the English Literature club stood Browning off at one side for the day while they paid due attention to the mean way old Ben Todd had used Maria Trundy who had slaved and toiled for him and his all her life long, only to be turned out of her home at last.

The next day several women in the village dropped around to call on Miss Trundy. They sounded her cautiously on her feelings in regard to the Squire's marriage. She expressed her entire happiness and deep content in her her entire happiness and deep content in her new home.

"She's awful sly about it,"the callers reported to inquiring friends, "but you can see that she is just eatin' her heart out."

At last Mrs. Johnson, the wife of the lawyer who was the Squire's rival in the village, went around to call on Miss Trundy. "I think something ought to be done to inform that poor lone woman about her rights," declared Mrs. Johnson. "My husband says that no woman ever had a better chance to sue for breach of promise than Maria Trundy and fur's we're concerned we're willin' to help her."

But it required a week of constant argument on the part of Mrs. Johnson to convince Miss Trundy that she had been used ill. At last she admitted that—yes, at one time she had hoped, -well, just imagined that perhaps the Squire might ask her to take the head of his house-might ask her to take the head of his household as his wife.

"Of course you thought so—of course you did," declared Mrs. Johnson. "He led you to believe so right along. You didn't calculate on bein' an old maid, did you? Of course not. But I know of lots of good men who would have shined up to you if they hadn't thought you were promised to the Squire. He has just gone to work and spoiled your whole life for you, and then when you are old he has turned you were promised to the squire. He has just gone to work and spoiled your whole life for you, and then when you are old he has turned you out for a younger woman. He ought to be rid on a rail out of town. The folks in the village here are just as mad as they can stick. They're all your friends!"

Miss Trundy had nothing to do except ponder on the matter that had been suggested to her by Mrs. Johnson. With that lady at her elbow pretty constantly to put into her mind things that she couldn't think of on her own account, Miss Trundy came at last to look on herself as a very unfortunate woman. She commenced to pity herself for her lonely state. From that stage to developing resentment against the one to whom she ascribed her single blessedness was an easy step. She finally agreed with Mrs. Johnson that the squire had goin' to root up a scandal and drag her into it."

Two days later Mrs. Johnson told her that Mrs. Todd had said to a party from whom it came straight, that Maria Trundy "had figured every way she knew how to catch the Squire and had even made eyes at him before his first wife died." That shaft hurt. Miss Trundy vowed that she did not believe a word of it and yet she lay awake half the night and thought the matter over. In the morning she decided that probably Mrs. Todd really did say it.

Mrs. Johnson came around after breakfast. "What are you goin' to do about that matter, Miss Trundy?" she inquired. "The whole village is watchin' you and waitin' for you to take some action to stop their mouths. And if you've got any spunk at all you'll do it."

"I've thought it over," said Maria with her mouth quivering, "and I hain't goin' to say a word to either of 'em. The Squire knows how hard I worked for his interests. I believe that today he has horror of conscience because he turned me out to make room for another woman."

"Well, what are you goin' to do?" persisted Mrs. Johnson.

"I'm goin' to ha'nt the both of them." de-

"Well, what are you goin' to do?" persisted Mrs. Johnson.

"I'm goin' to ha'nt the both of them," declared Maria solemnly.

"You're goin' to what—t—t?" cried the lawyer's wife.

"The Good Book says to treat well them as do despitefully use you," said Miss Trundy. "I hain't goin' to work and try to hurt the Squire and his wife with the law. That wouldn't be Christian. But I mean to hold the errors of their ways before them both in this life and in the life to come. As long as I stay on earth I shall ha'nt them and when I am laid away in the cold ground my spirit will still ha'nt them. I shall be an uncomplaining martyr. And I know that God will touch their hard hearts through me." through me.

"Well of all things!" ejaculated Mrs. Johnson. "What do you mean to do?"
"What do I mean to do?" echoed the spinster.

single blessedness was an easy step. She finally agreed with Mrs. Johnson that the squire had used her just as mean as a man could use a woman.

But at one thing Miss Trundy stuck. She wouldn't bring suit on the ground of breach of promise. Even Lawyer Johnson's arguments could not bring her over to that resolve. It was disappointing to Mrs. Johnson and the rest of the villagers but Miss Trundy stood firm. She declared that however she might "Maria acted queer for some weeks before she left our house," said the Squire to his as-tonished spouse. "I wouldn't be surprised if she is touched just a leetle. Old maids get that way." that way.

But that particular old maid grew troublesome before the week was over. Every time the Squire and his wife ventured out of doors the Squire and his wife ventured out of doors she was at their heels. And as she refused to hold any converse with the angry old man he couldn't understand what it all meant. Miss Trundy had left his house in the best spirits and with a perfect understanding existing between them. She knew that she was mentioned in his will. Yet here she was chasing behind like a Hecate. She ambled at their heels when they went to church, to lodge, to the store or for a stroll. All the people were at the doors as they passed in singular procesthe doors as they passed in singular proces

At last the Squire's wife came home from every trip through the village, sobbing with hysterical indignation. She demanded that the hysterical indignation. She demanded that the Squire lock up this madwoman who was making existence a burden. But the Squire, remembering the years of past service, was not willing to treat Maria harshly. He made careful inquiries. He studied the causes leading up to this obsession that was haunting him.

And then he sprung the biggest sensation the village had ever known. For he stood right up in church at the conclusion of the sermon one Sunday and commenced to talk.

sermon one Sunday and commenced to talk.
Grim and stiff and uncompromising, Maria had sat just behind him during the service. She as well as all the rest of the people present gasped when the Squire commenced his little oration. And all the folks were there, for congregations had been large since the "ha'nt" ad commenced.

The Squire told the story of the influences that had been brought to bear on an inoffen-sive woman to induce her to turn against her best friends and make herself and them ridiculous before the eyes of a gaping village. He described the manner in which that woman had cared for his home and had been a mother to

As he talked, Maria's angular stiffness doubled forward. When he paid tribute to her unselfishness and honor before she had been misled by busybodies in the village—and he gave the names of those persons—Maria crept around the end of the Squire's pew and sat down in its further end. In another minute she had her head in the lap of the Squire's wife and was sobbing.

ute she had her head in the lap of the Squire's wite and was sobbing.

The Squire changed his topic then and paid his respects to the meddlers who had ruined the peace of a good woman, and those present do say that fiercer invective never rolled from his lips even in the big murder trial of the county. A half dozen whom he especially assailed bowed their heads and sneaked from the church. No one tried to stop him. The talk around town next day was that it proved the most helpful sermon on neighborliness that was ever preached in the old church.

When the Squire went home to dinner he had his wife on one arm and Maria on the other.

Maria gave a half sob.

"Don't twit, Squire, after it's all been settled," remonstrated his wife.

Some-times when the day was warm and he was tired he would wheel his little cart under the shade of a tree on some more retired street, and take a nap; but each time on waking he would find the greater part of his candy gone. on one of the large estates, and get his hap, for Urban walked and pulled his cart long distances, and got very weary.

One day he found himself in a cosy, retired place in a hedge corner and concluded to stay there all night, and after dark he took up his abode. "Surely there was no one around," he thought, and he would have one good night's sleep unmolested; but when morning came he found the same old experience had occurred. He was a trifle disheartened, but he turned his pockets inside out, counted his pennies, and decided to leave the town. He could not trace anybody or anything. He would try some other place. He had pennies enough to buy a breakfast, a new supply of candy, and pay his toll over the river to Leesdale.

He had been two days in Leesdale when he met with the same loss, in the same mysterious way. Then he decided to get out of the town if not out of the state, and so he went away, but he did not go far.

At Marvale, the next town to Leesdale, the summer cottages were open and the occupants were come for the season, and among them

One evening some friends came to welcome them to Marvale. They chatted of things past and present and things to come.

"Did Moll Pitcher come, too?" asked Mrs.

Ballard.

"Oh, yes, we could not leave the parrot at home alone," replied Mrs. Headly.

Katie Headly came in just then, flushed from a ride on her "precious Cradle" as she called her steed. More conversation followed, and then the Ballards took their leave.

The next morning the bowl of loaf sugar was empty. This had happened several times at the breakfast table. Mrs. Headly felt annoyed, breakfast table the meach a lump of sugar. The next morning the bowl of loaf sugar was empty. This had happened several times at the breakfast table. Mrs. Headly felt annoyed, but kindly admonished the butler that this must not happen again. He vindicated himself very well, but several breakfasts more found the sugar-bowl empty until the Headlys began to feel very curious. The servants had been with them for many years, certainly they had no hand in the disappearance of the sugar-water; but before he went he wheeled his cart in among the shrubbery and under the shade of a tall bush to keep the sun from it.

When he returned from the stable he found half of his candy gone. He did not know what to do but to complain to the cook, who told him that there was no one on the premises who would even think of such a thing as taking his candy. So he left thinking that his poor and mysterious luck had started up again.

The family determined to solve the mystery, the disappearance of the loaf sugar, for the ground sugar never was missed. So the butler was instructed to fix up a place in one corner of the dining-room to lie down, and to pass the night there.

Bertan drank strong coffee and kept awake until half past one o'clock when he fell asleep. When he awoke it was daylight. He got up and found the sugar-bowl empty. He felt that he was beaten, and felt ashamed of himself for falling asleep. He would sit up all night next time. At breakfast Bertan confessed that he fell asleep. "No sugar" became a by-word. The weather being fine Mr. and Mrs. Headly went on a twenty-mile drive, returning in the early evening. It had been a very warm day, and they had dined at a country hotel on the way. Mrs. Headly retired for the night feeling very weary and in the night she was taken suddenly ill. Mr. Headly got up at once and went quietly down the side stairs and entered a small passage-way which led into the dining-room, to get some wine in the sideboard.

It was a bright moonlight night and what did he see but Lilyput, the little black and tan dog on the sideboard with her nose in the sugar-bowl. She jumped down with a lump in her mouth and ran into the hall. Mr. Headly kept quiet, and in came Lilyput again, jumped up into the chair beside the sideboard and from there to the sugar-bowl, took out a lump of sugar and went into the hall. This

On her fourth trip Mr. Headly followed her into the hall and saw her lay the sugar down before Kaiser who ate it and munched with great satisfaction. Mr. Headly said nothing but was infinitely amused. He took the wine and returned to his wife, and to divert her he told her the secret of the missing sugar, which also amused her. amused her. "You bring your candy-cart to my place Vetchy, to-morrow noon, and leave it in the same place, and go to the stable for a drink of water just as you did before," said Mr. Headly.

Mr. Headly surprised him and Kaiser crawled Mr. Headly surprised him and Kaiser crawled quickly away through the shrubbery on the other side of the house. When Vettchy returned to his cart of course some of his candy was gone. Mr. Headly then explained matters. Vetchy said that he had seen a large dog but he had not thought anything of it. He never petted strange dogs. "Well," said Mr. Headly, "no doubt my dog Kaiser is the guilty one all through these losses, and I will gladly pay for it all."

"You are very kind, sir," said Vetchy.

He is an athlete and a fine horseman, and he has had military experience in France during the Commune riots at Paris, in the Russo-Turkish war, under Lord Roberts in India and in South Africa, and later in Egypt. In 1883 he was military secretary to the Marquis of Lorne, then Governor-General of Canada. His wife, the Countess of Minto, is as popular as her husband and she has done much in harmonizing the conflicting conditions which exist among the different peoples and religions of Canada. She is a descendant of the famous Indian Princess, Pocahontas, and is in that far an American.

33, 34. All the world loves a lover, they say, and at least all the fashionable and official world seemed to be particularly fond of Mr. Payne Whitney, the son of ex-Secretary of the Navy Whitney, and Miss Helen Hay, the daughter of Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State, whose wedding in Washington last month was one of the most notable events socially that has occurred in recent years. Both the young people are the children of very wealthy parents, and as their friends are among those people, their wedding presents represented many thousand of dollars. Mr. Whitney is a popular young man, and his wife, as Helen Hay, has made quite a name for herself as a writer.

35. It is not often that the multi-millionaire, especially when he is young and wants to have all the enjoyments of life, takes to work and politics but young Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York is an exception. He went to work as a railroad machinist with the New York Central Railroad, controlled by his family, and last year invented a new tender for locomotives which has been adopted by many leading roads. He is in the offices of the great road, but with the incoming of the reform administration of the city of New York he accepted the position of Civil Service Commissioner tendered him by Mayor Seth Low, and already has shown that he is well fitted for his new duties. It may be said of the Vanderbilts that they are about the best types of our rich people. Mr. Vanderbilt has thirty patents pending for improvements in locomotives, and he is about thirty years old.

For a great many years Italy's representative to the United States, Baron Fava, was noted for his penuriousness, and evident lack of desire to take any part in the duties of his post, further than those he could not avoid. He was a friend of Bismarck and of Crispi, and they taught him. He is fifty years of age.

(So many inquiries are made by "Comfort" readers concerning real estate (country and city) farms and locations for homes that this column has become a necessity and here we shall be glad to answer all questions.)

Any paid subscriber who desires to make a change in their present situation or are in any way uncomfortable in their abode and want information about any particular location in any State in the Union can address "The Comfort Home Finder,"Augusta, Maine, and we will try and serve them.

H. A. D. Hope, Idaho.—There are thousand of acres of land in Virginia which may be had for the taxes. In some instances this makes the land worth even less than homestead prices in the West. Much of this Virginia land is old and poor, but it answers readily to fertilizing and care, and the climate is greatly in its favor. Schools and churches abound and there is a welcome awaiting any good citizen who comes from the North or elsewhere. A land circular has been sent to you with details.

Mrs. H. G., Nashville, Tenn.—Land in Blue Grass Kentucky is worth from $50 to $150 an acre, but if you are now living on a farm near Nashville, you are in very nearly as fine a country as the Blue Grass section is. Unless you can get a very good price, indeed, for your place, we advise you to remain where you are.

Inquirer, Akron, Ohio.—The so-called abandoned farms of Massachusetts are pretty generally distributed about the state, and their prices are remarkably low, many farms being offered for less than the houses on them cost. Some of these abandoned farms have proved to be good investments, and very few of them are not worth their price, provided an active, progressive farmer gets hold of one. You can get all the information you need, short of personal acquaintance, by writing to the Secretary of Agriculture, Boston, Mass.

Indio, Sunbury, Pa.—Steubenville is the county seat of Jefferson county, Ohio, with a population of about 15,000, paved streets, trolley lines, fine public buildings, numerous churches and schools, and a cultivated, Christian and hospitable people, whose thrift is seen all over their progressive city. Politically the town is republican. A good home may be bought for from $1,500 to $8,000 and rents are from twelve dollars and a half, per month, up, for such as you describe.

K. L. G., Haverhill, Mass.—We would not advise your removal to the Pacific coast on Puget Sound until you had thoroughly informed yourself of the country. The climate is very mild, never hot or cold, but it is very damp, and as yet farming is in its infancy, and will never get much beyond that stage, except in the raising of certain kinds of fruits, dairy products, poultry and eggs. Clearing the ground is very expensive as the timber is of enormous growth and the soil is filled with roots. It is also too wet for any of the grain crops. East of the Cascade Range, however, all these conditions are changed, and no finer wheat and fruit crops are raised in the world than here. Yes, the official you mention is perfectly reliable, and you may believe what he tells you.

Tired Out, Rockville, Vt.—Your story of the hard what he tells you.

Tired Out, Rockville, Vt.—Your story of the hard times you have had for ten years on "Rocky Farm," is interesting, and if you gave it up and went down into the Eastern Shore of Maryland with the five thousand dollars you could raise, you could buy a very fine place and still have a little to put in the bank. The metropolis of the Eastern Shore is Easton or Oxford, and land in that vicinity is worth from $30 to $60 an acre, and good land, too. The wheat and fruit are particularly fine, and rail and water transportation are ample. Washington, D. C. is only about two hours away and Baltimore, about three. The climate is mild all the year, as it is tempered by the sea. But Vermont is further from the Eastern Shore than the map shows and as you have lived all your life in the Green Mountain state, you would better try the South awhile before pulling up stakes in the North.

J. W. E., Whitewater, Wis.—We do not know who

J. W. E.. Whitewater, Wis.—We do not know who has informed you that land in the mountain portion of Kentucky is valuable for farming purposes, but whoever it is is evidently trying to obtain your money under false pretenses. Some farms, along the tributaries of the Kentucky, Big Sandy and Cumberland rivers, make a living for their owners, but that is about all. Back from the water-courses the land may have some timber or mineral value, or may not. If not, you can buy all you want for twenty-five cents an acre, or less.

N. Y. T. Cairo, Ills.—You cannot do much in N. Y. T., Cairo, Ills.—You cannot do much in raising sugar in Louisiana unless you have some capital. Better try something more suitable to small farming.

Stuart, Winchester, Ky.

J. O. McD., Warrenton, Mo.—A turpentine orchard of four or five thousand trees, covering, say, about 200 acres may be rented in North Carolina at $50 a crop, or year, and the profit is from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter an acre. It is customary to have about twenty orchards to the plant, which requires a capital of about $5,000. Your family would not find it desirable to live in the immediate neighborhood of the orchards, but there are towns with excellent society and all advantages at no great distance where you could at least spend your Sundays at home.

Miss D. Austin, Mich.—Such a home as you

Sundays at home.

Miss D. Austin, Mich.—Such a home as you desire in Hartford, Conn. could not be purchased for less than $10,000, if it could be secured at all. Hartford is a home town of very well-to-do people, and those who have pleasant homes do not want to sell, unless—which is the Yankee in them—they can get every cent the place is worth, and have another in view that they can get at a bargain.

Two Young Men, Ozark, Ark.—Don't try farming in Cuba unless you have a good deal more than one thousand dollars each. Cuba is all right for development by people from the United States, but the developers must have plenty of money and know what they are going to do before they begin. If you have two thousand dollars between you, and are tired of farming in Arkansas, why not go into some sort of small manufacturing for local consumption?

HE latest novelty in the omnipresent nickel-in-the-slot machine is said to be an automatic device for blacking boots. The customer drops the necessary coin that starts the machine in motion, and then thrusts his foot into one compart ment where his shoe is brushed. In another compartment the shoe is covered with blacking, and in the third it is polished, the whole operation taking about a minute and a half. The progress of the operation is indicated upon a dial.

An ingenious woman has found a way to fix candles on the top of birthday cakes. In the flame of a candle she heats the eye end of a needle, pushing it while warm into the lower end of each small candle. The needle point pressed through the icing makes the tiniest puncture, permitting, too, the closer use of the candle, often desirable for a birthday count. If desired, tiny stars or circles may be cut from gilt or colored paper, the needle slipped through so that the paper forms a little mat on which the candle rests.

nir. A unique way of serving grape juice, at a luncheon for warm weather, is in-side of a lemon. A small slice is cut from one end of the lemon to allow it to stand securely on a plate. Then the top is cut off to form a cover. The inside is carefully removed from both lemon and cover, and the shell is filled with cool grape juice. The cover is then put on, two small round holes are punctured in the cover, two straws inserted, and where they disappear through the hole dainty bows of ribbon of the color scheme of the luncheon are tied. The slight flavor of the lemon is a pleasant addition to the grape juice flavor.

Veracious Records of the Doin's in the Cobb Corner Postoffice, "Writ out" by the Boy Behind the Counter.

[EDITOR'S NOTE. The quaint philosophers, the dry wags, the shrewd dickerers and the eminent yarn-spinners of the countryside make a forum of the country postofice when there is room at the rear around the big stove. The stories and incidents on which some of the most successful human interest novels of the day are constructed come from the quaint loungers around the stores in Yankee communities. These official records of "Jeth's Crowd" are to be taken down month by month for the readers of "Comfort," Ind we hope that as you become acquainted with the members of the "Congress" your interest in their discourse and stories will deepen.

In the April number of "Comfort" the "Cobb's Corner Congress" will continue sessions.

Postmaster came out of his "pen" after he had finished distributing the mail. He is the only man in Cobb's Corner who takes a daily paper—and his copy is sent to him free. Every forenoon after the mail is in the boxes he comes out and stands before the assembled members of the cracker-barrel the cracker-barrel Congress and reads aloud whatever is especially striking in the news field.

He tucked the paper

under his arm as he walked forward, so as to leave his hands free. He stuffed two

"Reckon you old sanups would set right there on your haunches like woodchucks and let the fire go plum out," he snorted.

"Haint none of us been 'specially delegated to feed your stove for ye yet," Uncle Wack Spofford replied. "If we sh'd go to jammin' the wood in ye would be growlin' jest as bad out of the other side of your mouth. So thereye be!"

The Postmaster grunted. Then he unfolded the paper and settled his spees on the end of his nose. "There hain't no gittin' along with ye anyway," he snapped, flinging one more shaft at them. "But listen while I read ye something." something."

In a high-pitched, cracked voice, interrupted every now and then by a vigorous snuff The Postmaster read:

"Two weeks ago the store of Jason Beals was closed by an attachment and a seal put on the door. It now transpires that for a week Durfee has been engaged at the back door carting off the goods. He had cleaned out the store entire of everything and if it had not been for his greed he might have escaped undetected. But he made such a disturbance one night in getting the safe out that he was apnight in getting the safe out that he was apprehended by our vigilant constable and will answer to his misdeeds at the next term of

But Perk liked to steal lo'ds of hay and a bin of pertaters out of a suller and sheep and all them things. One time his brother-in-law's fam'ly was away to a grove meetin' and Perk went down to their place, burst into the house, dressed himself up in his brother-in-law's wedding suit, even to the tall hat, put a halter on a cow, loaded a rack with hay, hitched the cow on behind and started for the next town. So it was talked over and the sheriff was called on to see if suthin' couldn't be done to discourage Perk's souvenir craze. He said he reckoned there could if the court she knew herself and he thunk she did. "They didn't have any light in the school house. The twelve men set around on the desks and talked about one thing and another. It got to be midnight. Perk had strolled around more or less for he didn't seem to be tryin' to git away. He talked with one man after the other and was real sociable. T is fast becoming a fact that we no longer look to the other side for our fash-ions as in former days, and the extent to which Paris the extent to which Paris styles govern American ideas is daily growing less. French creations are copied to a great degree but they are compelled to undergo modifications before they are acceptable to American taste, which shows that American women are possessed of considerable common sense and not naturalsessed of considerable common sense and not naturally given to running to extremes. Some have startled us all by declaring the dip front to be on the wane, but it will doubtless retain its popularity for some time to come, at least through the coming season. Most of the new gown models display this style. There is a modification noticeable however, and some round effects will be seen, but the beloved dip front will be with us for some time to come.

Beaded belts are certainly growing in favor. There are the elastic and the non-elastic belts in all sizes and shapes. Steel is the more popular, but in the high grade belts some remarkably handsome effects are seen in black and gold. Another striking novelty in which flowers figure prominently, has Edelweiss blossoms hand-painted on a white ground with a border in Paris ecru. Habit backs obtain largely in cloth gowns, but are seldom seen absolutely plain, being relieved by buttons, or straps, or rows of flat trimming, anything to break up the severe surface.

An odd trimming used on a gown of pale gray broadcloth was as follows. Around the foot of the skirt, and graduating up the front, were large circles cut out of the cloth under which was laid striped silk of black and white, the white predominating. The edges of the circles were cut out irregularly, showing sharply over the silk. The same design decorated bodice and sleeves.

NE of the ablest mem-bers of the United States Senate is Hon. George Frisbie Hoar, George Frisbie Hoar, of Massachusetts. Senator Hoar has been a member of Congress since 1869, serving four terms in the House of Representatives before his election to the high er branch, which occurred in 1877, so that for thirty-three pational legislature. He was born in Concord years he has served his commonwealth in the national legislature. He was born in Concord, Mass., in 1826, and graduated from Harvard college before he was twenty years of age. The degree of LL. D. has been conferred upon him by four colleges, William and Mary, Amherst, Yale and Harvard. He is not so old by three years as Senator Pettus of Alabama, but he has seen more of congressional life. In 1876 he served as a member of the electoral commission and for more than thirty years he has been a prominent figure in national affairs.

Just now, he is opposed to the retention of the Philippines and is insistent that the government shall relinquish its control over these islands and assist the people thereof in establishing a republic of their own. Senator Hoar is recognized as one of the foremost anti-imperialists of the country although he is a firm supporter of the Republican party.

The Legislature of New Jersey has elected John Fairfield Dryden United Fairfield Dryden United States Senator to succeed the late Senator Sewall. Senator Dryden is of old New England stock. He was born in Farmington, Maine, Aug. 7, 1839, and was educated for the legal profession. He was named for John Fairfield, who was Governor of the State NEW JERSEY. of Maine at the time of his birth. For nearly thirty years he has been prominent in New Jersey business circles and is the president of a leading insurance company.

The Cuban reciprocity question is pending in Congress. The bone of contention is the question of reducing the duty on Cuban Sugar. It is said that the President and the members of the cabinet are in favor of the proposition to reduce the duty about twenty-five per cent.

JUSTICE BREWER.

The speech of David Josiah Brewer, one of the justices of the United States Supreme Court, which was delivered in Philadelphia a short time ago, has attracted national attention. In this speech Justice Brewer advances the pessimistic idea that this country is in a bad way. He says that it is a this country is in a bad way. He says that it is a mistake to suppose that this republic has already won the battle of life. The battle is still on and it must be waged with all the courage and persistence of the Pilgrim Fathers, or else it may be lost. Justice Brewer has been a member of the Supreme Court since 1839, and is a nephew of the late Justice Stephen J. Field, who for many years was a member of the same high tribunal.

A bill reducing the war revenue taxes $77,000,000 has been completed by Chairman Payne of the Ways and Means Committee and has passed the House without a dissenting vote.

Arthur Pue Gorman has again been elected to the United States Senate from the State of Maryland. Fifty years ago he was appointed a page in the body in which he has already served with conspicuous ability for eighteen years and in which he will take his seat on March 4, 1903. It is not often that a member of the United States Senate returns to that body after an absence of several years caused by the defeat of the party to which he belongs, but in the case of Mr. Gorman such an experience has come to him. Arthur Pue Gorman was born in Maryland in 1839, and during his sixty-three years of life has cut a greater figure in the politics of the nation at united States Commissioner of the Massachusetts Burcau of Labor and since 1835 as United States Commissioner. He holds high rank among the educators of the country.

The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections has favorably reported the amendment to the constitution changing the day for the inauguration of the President from March 4 to the last Thursday in April. The resolution provides that the change shall take effect in 1866, he held the office of postmaster. He then went back to Maryland and has been an active politician ever since and has been an active politician ever since. His early experiences in the Senate chamber bred in him an ambition and a determination to become a Senator himself some day, and his youthful dream was realized when he succeeded William Pinckney Whyte and took his seat March 4, 1881, serving until 1899. Mr. Gorman has always been a Democrat and was manager of the Democratic National Campaign in 1884, which resulted in the election of Grover Cleveland to the presidency of the United States His return to the Senate after four years' re-tirement may be regarded as one of the unusual peculiarities of politics.

Dr. Presley Marion Rixey, whom President Roosevelt has made surgeon general of the navy, has been a capable and popular officer of that service since 1874. He is a native Virginian, entered the navy when twenty-four years old and has served in various positions in the medical department President McKinley had promised to nominate him for the surveyor generalship. for the surveyor generalship, a promise President Roosevelt has ratified.

Senator Hoar, from the Committee on Judiciary, has favorably reported a bill for the protection of the President of the United States, the Vice-President and others. It provides that any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction, wilfully kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President or any officer in line of succession, or who shall wilfully cause the death of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, shall be punished with death. An attempt to commit either of the offences mentioned is also punishable by death. The bill also provides twenty years' imprisonment for the person found guilty of advising the killing of the persons named, and five years' imprisonment is provided for persons convicted of uttering, spoken or published, which threaten to kill or advise or instigate any person to kill the person named.

An unusual proceeding marked a recent Presi-dent's reception of the foreign diplomats. The line of notable callers was lied by a woman. Lady Pauncefote it was who had the distinction of filling this unique function. Lord Pauncefote, the British embassador and dean of the corps, being unavoidably absent, his place was filled by his stately wife, who led the line and was the first to extend her respects to the President.

Senator William B. Allison of Iowa, whose re-election to a sixth term in the United States Senate oconted States Senate occurred a short time ago, is the Nestor, in point of service, of the higher branch of Congress. In the history of this country he is the third man to receive the bonor of a sixth ceive the honor of a sixth of Rhode Island died before he began service

Forty years ago Mr. Allison was elected a member of the lower house of Congress, where he served four terms. In 1873 he became a member of the Senate and will have completed thirty years in that body on March 3, 1903. Judging from his magnificent physique and perfect health, he will probably serve out his sixth term and surpass the record of all his predecessors in the Senate. Mr. Allison is one of the most influential men in either branch of Congress. For many years he has been the of the most innuential men in either branch of Congress. For many years he has been the chairman of the committee on appropriations, a position regarded as the most important in either body. His name has often been mentioned in connection with the presidency, but he has steadfastly refused to become a candi-date for that high office, believing that he could render more service to his country in the position he now occupies then if he were elect

March and Lent are two combinations that serve to drive all the fashionable sinners to fill the piazzas of Southern hotels or of nearer by resorts. March is the great vacation month for those whose health, conscience and purse will permit them to migrate.

A well-known magazine has recently been printing a series of articles on the remodelling of farmhouses. A long step toward beauty and homelikeness would be made by opening and using the old fireplaces that are bricked up in so many old-time farmhouses. An open fire is today one of the greatest of modern luxuries.

The changes and chances that one year holds has never been more strongly illustrated than by the political results of the year from March 1901 to March 1902. Then it was generally believed that "Teddy's" political enemies heaved a sigh of content as they deposited him upon the quiet shelf of the vice presidency. Now by a great tragedy, Theodore Roosevelt stands at the head of this great nation.

Since 1893, there has been an annual meeting of the historians of the world in international conference. This year the meeting is to be held in the Eternal City. Rome made the history of the world for thousands of years and it is fitting that a conference that has the possibility of shaping events by the manner in which it writes history should meet in this city backwards to which all the roads of history run.

One of the latest inventions for massage is a rubber hand. We have long been in the colloquial habit of considering the term "rubber neck" as a reproach. The rubber hand, however, is expected to be in reality a glad hand for its use is to prevent baldness. The gentle friction of the scalp that it produces is claimed to be more directly beneficial in effect than massage by the fingers. This would seem to kill the theory of the transmission of electric or magnetic force, for rubber is a non-conductor. However, rubber hands, minus a thumb. are in the market and the baldheaded row will soon be ancient history in a different sense from what it is now.

only railroad having a terminal in the city enters, other railroads are announcing the proposed construction of tunnels under both the rivers that hem the city on either side. A trolley company also proposes to tunnel the East River. The city and the river will soon be literally the second story for the new underground railway, and the many proposed tunnels under the rivers will send a large proportion of the travel underground. New Yorkers will be literally where they have so long figur--"out of sight." atively claimed they were-

The peril of those who go down in ships will soon be only a matter of past history. The modern ocean steamship seemed almost to obliterate the dangers of the deep but occasionally an accident like that of the ill-fated Bourgoyne startles the world. The fact that ships have telegraphed by the Marconi system where a distance of one hundred twenty-five miles lay between them furnishes an additional security to ocean travel. In addition to this a mechanical invention has just been perfected by means of which the officer on the bridge can close the doors of all the waterproof compartments by one motion. They have each been closed separately and it was the failure to do this on the part of the French sailors that led to the awful disaster. In case of collision or striking a rock, the ship can almost instantly be made watertight so that sinking is practically impossible. No recent life saving devices have promised so much as this latest one does.

William H. Maxwell, the head of the public school system for the greatest city of our nation, recently named some books with which every teacher should in his judgment be familiar. The list was remarkable for its brevity. It included the Bible, at least one play of Shakespeare, a translation of the Iliad and of the Odyssey, the Vicar of Wakefield and Idylls of the King. The very conciseness and simplicity of demand of this recommendation finds favor in an age of books without number and of reading lists that appal by length. It is the quality rather than the quantity of this list that makes for culture. If one should beware the man of one book, how much greater should be the respect forced from a mental adversary by the alert intellectual acumen of the man who had mastered and made his own the intellectual potentiality of these few volumes.

Two professors in the University of Chicago have recently made some of the most remarkable discoveries concerning the body. They have demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt, or the possibility of dispute, that nerve force is entirely an electric process. The nerve is a gelatinous substance, the atoms of which contain minute charges of electricity. These charges may be either positive or negative. They expect to demonstrate the true nature of death. In experiments upon sea urchins' eggs they have postponed death indefinitely by the use of potassium cyanide solutions. Under ordinary conditions this is a deadly poison, almost instantaneous in its results. They argue that the cell structure in the human body and in the sea urchin's egg is very similar. So many fountains of perpetual youth have been discovered that the public is slow to accept scientific conclusions concerning experiments in this line of prolonging life. The man who would merely discover a means of prolonging life would hardly be hailed as a general benefactor. If he could prolong youth as he prolonged life he might be hailed as a benefactor in reality.

International coquetting is always of interest to the lookers-on at the great game of nations. When a family "rises in the world" it speedily recognizes the fact that its neighbors have recognized the fact. The sensations of the newly rich must be a mixture of amusement, self admiration and a discreet endeavor to act as though they had always been used to considby Yankee invention and energy and the nations of the world seem to have awakened suddenly to the realization of the fact that the United States has "arrived" as the French say.

Company is throwing smiles and bouquets at would really do a work of far-reaching philaneration. We have made a commercial empire United States has "arrived" as the French say. Germany is throwing smiles and bouquets at the United States. She sends her favorite prince to us and the daughter of our president christens the Imperial yacht that American ship builders are constructing. This is the smile! The bouquet consists in the tacit acknowledgment on the part of Germany of the Monroe Doctrine. Germany intends to collect some debts which Venezuela owes to Germans and if it be necessary force may be employed. and if it be necessary force may be employed. Germany explains with great courtesy to the United States that she has no intention of possessing herself of any of the territory of Venezuela. Thus the Monroe Doctrine is acknowledged by another of the great nations.

The work-a-day world, the world that gets The work-a-day world, the world that gets up at six in the morning, dines from a tin pail and is ready to go to bed at eight, is looking for a millionaire who has a real human streak in him—a millionaire who believes the sentence, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." There are books enough in the world, sermons enough in the world, medicine enough in the world—but not enough innocent amusement. In the cities, one may find almost everything free but fun. It is useless to declare that the love of amusement is a sign of moral decay Scarcely a day now passes that does not reveal some new tunnel scheme for New York.

TRICK OF "HARE-LIP" TODD.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

One of the partners was "Figger-four" Jake,
The other was "Hare-lip" Todd.
They peddled their halibut, haddock and hake,
Mackerel, clams and cod.
"Figger-four" Jake had an angled knee,
And he walked with a bob and hop;
And "Hare-lip" Todd conversed, did he,
With a Scandinavian chop.
But each to the other was complement:
Jake had a fog-horn shout,
He could clamor their wares as on they went
And Todd could hand them out.
But some of the people would sniff and smell
And spitefully then would say,
The cart could speak for itself quite well
For at least a mile away.
Yet "Figger-four" Jake and "Hare-lip" Todd,
Abashed by no flout or jeer,
Still peddled their haddock and hake and cod
To the townsfolk year by year.
Till at last, though no one exactly knew
How the bickering came about,
Their trade relations were knocked askew
And Jake and Todd fell out.
So cach of them furnished a rival cart,
With fish of every kind,
And as soon as "Figger-four" made his start
Old Todd trailed close behind.
Then Jake would bellow with lusty yell,
Riding from door to door.
But Todd would wait for a breathing spell
In the howl of "Figger-four."
"Twas about like this:—"Now here ye go!
For nice fresh hake and cod.
Mackerel, halbut, haddock—yo ho!
Tongues and sounds and scrod."
And right behind with his elbows peaked, Huddupping on, Todd came;
And through the gap of his hare-lip squeaked,
"H' I h'ah h'ust 'he h'ame!"

Forces his scheme to pay,
There's always the fellow, a drone or afraid,

When the other has cornered it.
He steals the fruits of the enterprise
When the hustler stops for wind,

Let some millionaire endow a theatre that shall present good, wholesome a theatre that shall present good, wholesome plays, alternating with popular concerts. Let the purpose be not to instruct but to amuse in an innocent and healthy manner. The question of administration would be a difficult one but it could be done. As it is now, the amusements open to the poorer class are often demoralizing and degrading. One poor theatre can nullify the work of a dozen libraries. There is a mighty power that is given into the hands of irresponsible and careless people, that is the opportunity to amuse the mass of the people. A good laugh is better than a dose of physic. Myremedy does that, even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you. I know it and I take this risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay, and gladly. I have learned that people in general are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all I ask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Simply write me a postal card or letter. Let me send you an order for the medicine; also a book. Take it for a month, for it won't harm you anyway. If it cures pay $5.50. I leave that entirely to you. Address Dr. Shoop, Box 304, Racine, Wis.

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

YOU CAN ONLY HAVE ONE MOTHER.

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

SUBSCRIBER asks the meaning of a marriage or attachment line with a cross against it. It is a bad sign and the sign of some obstacle in the way of the mar-riage or trouble afterwards, but unless it appears in both hands this does not hold good.

She also says: "A line heavy and deep, with She also says: "A line heavy and deep, with two smaller, short lines accompanying it, starts from the heart line, both hands, (tho' the left is not nearly so deep) rises to the head line and cuts diagonally thro' it, breaking the head line under Saturn; this head line goes on and ends in stars just above the percussion. This line from heart to head is growing longer. What does it signify?" I should call such a line a worry line which would indicate some trouble connected with the heart which causes line a worry line which would indicate some trouble connected with the heart which causes the subject a good deal of anxiety. It may also mean some danger to the life either by accident or murderous design. If the head line, however, ends in a star on Jupiter, this means a great deel of good luck with an honorable marriage. On the contrary, if it is on the other side of the hand on the percussion under the Mount of Mercury, it would mean some strange fatality coming into the life. A star is seldom a fortunate sign.

Again she said: "When the health or fate lines are twisted together near the wrist and Again she said: "When the heattn or tate lines are twisted together near the wrist and two short, straight lines run from them into the life line at about 60 or 65—what means that—" These marks would mean a very severe illness at that time and possibly death.

"I. S. Grandmother" sends impression of her head for meading this month. She has a peouliar hand and one which I should prefer to examine personally on account of the strangeness of some of the lines. As I have often said, it is difficult to judge of a hand by a smoke paper impression as the quality, shape and other things about a hand, which will affect their reading, do not show in any kind of an impression. In fact some of our best palmists refuse to read from impressions at all, although they often take impressions to keep after they have read the hand itself. I. S. has lead or will lead, a rather strange life. She suffered from ill health during her girlhood and was prevented from doing exactly as she chose by those who were her natural guardians. She married young, and happily and I think will marry the second time after she is forty. There was, second time after she is forty. There was, however, some strange circumstance connected with that first marriage which I frankly confess I do not quite make out under these impressions. I think she married some one either by coercion or because of the advice of friends, by coercion or because of the advice of friends, but the happier marriage will come later in life. There was some love affair early in life which caused her a great deal of trouble. One of her marriages, however, and I think the last one will prove very fortunate as she has a star on the Mount of Jupiter which is enough ever. She has many natural gifts of person and of mind. She has many friends and her talents are such that she might make a success of the stage if she would choose that as her profession. I would, however, advise her when she was near a good palmist to go and see him and get his reading. I am often asked to tell the exact truth about what I see in a hand but nearly always I am severely blamed if all I read is not favorable. Mr. Heron Allen gives an experience which is common I think to most palmists. On one occasion he was accosted by a crowd of young people who asked him to read their hands. He answered that he would read only one set and picking out a very young girl with a childish face and a lot of fluffy hair, told her that he would read hers but that if there was anything in her life she young girl with a childish face and a lot of fluffy hair, told her that he would read hers but that if there was anything in her life she did not want her companions to know to say so and he would read someone's else. She denied this and then he looked at her hands for an instant. Again looking up into the laughing, childish face he said:

"You look about nineteen, and as if you had never had a trouble in your life, but you have had the most terrible time of it I have ever seen written on a hand so young as yours. You have been married twice, and this, of all things, strikes me in your hand, that you married your second husband when your first husband was alive. Your first marriage was an affair of pique, an impulse of your foolish head, and was a miserable one; your second was an affair of heart, a love-match, but it was extremely bad for you from a commercial point of view. Even now, whilst you walk here with a smile on your lips and a racquet in your hand, you are undergoing some mental agony: hand, you are undergoing some mental agony: let me congratulate you on being the most astounding—actress, shall I say?—that I have ever come across."

ever come across."

She was silent for a moment, and then said:

"What I am going to tell you no one but my maid, who is in Chicago now, has ever known, and I tell it to you as a reward for speaking so boldly in the face of the magnificent lie I told you just now. I am an American and came here with some people today, and don't know a soul in the place; I am twenty-three (though I don't look it). At eighteen I quarrelled with my people, and in a fit of rage, married, simply to get rid of them. My husband turned out a scoundrel and knocked me about, to speak plainly, and after a year we were divorced. When I was twenty I fell in love for the first time, and married a man whom I simply worshipped. We were as happy as possible, but after a few months he was struck with a fever that gradually wasted him away, and he died two years ago, leaving me simply a pauper, for during his illness his business in Chicago left him. I came over here with some friends. What you say about my present state of mind is quite true, for I saw my first husband yesterday at the Academy, and have been in a state of terror ever since. Now, if you please, we will go back and lie to the other people about what you have been telling me."

THE GERMAN EMPEROR'S YACHT.

The Emperor's Yacht.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

T Shooters Island, in New York harbor, at this writ-ing, the finishing touches are being put on the schooner yacht being built from A. Cary Smith's design to the order of the Emperor of Germany. By courtesy of his designer, a drawing has been made of her from actual design, which shows exactly how she will look when under sail. The new yacht is built of steel, with steel The new yacht is built of steel, with steel deck angle iron for beam and frames. The yacht is built especially strong, as she is to make voyages across the North Sea and German ocean, and to the north. She is of the cruiser type, with channel plates on the outside. She is a clean-cut looking ship and is built to rate first-class in every particular. In every essential she is a New York boat from keel to truck. She was designed and built there, and everything about her rig and sails was made in New York.

She was designed and built there, and everything about her rig and sails was made in New York.

The launching of this magnificent boat is scheduled for Tuesday, February 25, and the event will be of international interest. Miss Alice Roosevelt, daughter of the President, will act as sponsor for the vessel. Prince Henry of Prussia, brother to the Emperor, is to be present at the great festivity which, it is confidently expected, will exceed in grandeur any similar event in the world's history. While in America Prince Henry will be entertained by the nation and by several of the leading cities. The royal yacht, Hohenzollern, has already arrived in New York and will participate in the launching program. Admiral Count von Baudissin is in command. Rear Admiral Robley D. Evans is in charge of the naval display in honor of the German prince.

The entire country and even the whole world awaits with intense interest the launching of the American yacht built for the Emperor of Germany, which, however, would pass as an event of no extraordinary interest, had not the Emperor made it an opportune occasion to display to the world the cordial good will existing event of no extraordinary interest, had not the Emperor made it an opportune occasion to display to the world the cordial good will existing between the German and American governments, and to thus put at rest the rumors of international friction which have disturbed the press and the people of both countries since the outbreak of the Spanish-American war.

The whole thing was suggested and planned by the Emperor as a most delicate and handsome compliment to American people and to their government and President.

When it is remembered that this Prince Henry whom he sends to represent him is the same, who as commander of the German naval squadron at Manila had the misunderstanding with Admiral Dewey, it is almost suggestive of an apology.

with Admiral Dewey, it is almost suggestive of an apology.

The Emperor's invitation for Miss Roosevelt to act the leading part in the ceremony, which the Emperor has sent his brother to take part in, is a public and official recognition that the daughter of a President ranks equally with the princes of the royal blood.

It is to be sincerely hoped that the American people will give the Prince such a reception as the good will which prompted his mission merits.

The following facts about Prince Henry of Prussia will be found of special interest at this

He is of the Prussian royal family of Hohenzollern.

He is the only brother of the reigning German Emperor; son of a German Emperor; grandson of a German Emperor; grandson of a German Emperor; grandson of a long line of Prussian Kings.

He is a nephew of the King of England and grandson of Queen Victoria.

He is a brother-in-law and also own cousin of the Czarına of Russia.

He is intimately connected by blood or marriage with the ruling houses of all the smaller German principalities and kingdoms.

At the time of his birth, his grandfather, William I., was King of Prussia, the empire not having been formed.

In 1871, his grandfather became first Emperor of the modern German Empire.

In 1888, his father, Frederick III., ascended the throne of Germany as second Emperor.

The same year Frederick III. died and was succeeded by his son, Henry's brother, William II., the present Emperor.

William II. has several children, who are now in line for succession to the throne. Prince Henry's chance of ever becoming Emperor is therefore extremely remote.

tremely remote.

HIS PHYSIQUE.

He is six feet and half an inch tall.

He weighs about 182 pounds.

He is always in the pink of physical condition and has not an ounce of fat upon his frame.

He wears a light brown beard and mustache. The mustache he allows to grow naturally, and he will not have barbers playing with it as they do with his imperial brother's.

His beard is trimmed to a point.

His eyes are blue and clear. He does not wear glasses.

His eyes are blue and clear. He does not wear glasses.

He is tireless, physically.
He is extraordinarily full-blooded, for he can stand for hours in a suit of wet clothes in a bitter wind and experience no ill results.

Even in the ball room of the imperial palace at Berlin he walks with the rolling swagger of a sailor. Directions from the Emperor on this point have no effect upon him.

His face is deeply tanned from long years at sea. His hands are coarse and red, and his nails kept short for the same reason.

His conversational tone is clear and hearty.
When singing he has a mellow bass voice.

HIS MORALS.
Unlike the great majority of royalties, he made a love match. Bismarck opposed the princess whom he selected, but he said he would remain a bachelor forever if he were denied. He had his way.

He has been a loving and faithful husband.

bachelor forever if he were defined. He had have way.

He has been a loving and faithful husband. Though the multitudinous temptations incident to a combination of sea life and royalty have been thrown in his way, he has laughed them off. No scandal has ever tainted his name.

He was a dutiful son, the favorite of his father, who left him the bulk of his private fortune.

He is a devoted father, making it an object of his life to lighten the burden of his eldest son, Waldemar, who is deaf and dumb.

He drinks beer, wine and spirits, but never to excess.

He smokes cigars and pipes, but not cigarettes.

He plays cards for money, but never so heavily as to involve his opponents beyond their immediate means.

He is not extravagant. Not even in his youth, when his allowance was comparatively small, did he run into debt.

In spite of his love for music, he is not of a melancholy disposition, nor is he subject to moods.

He is not vain; nor does he relish the frills and furbelows of court life.

He has the only democratic nature of all the royalties in Europe. He easily gets on terms of good-fellowship with all whom he meets.

He has a large degree of personal magnetism, which enables him to impress favorably people he meets for the first time.

He despises all men not thoroughly masculine; and women not entirely feminine.

Two months of 1902 slipped by, and how much have we accomplished? I am not speaking of the President, laboring to worthily fill the place of our deeply mourned McKinley; or of Congress, now deep in the struggle to better the condition of the country, or of any other of the national problems; but of the private, spiritual betterment of each one of us.

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from Heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!"

Our first letter this month takes us to that part of the country where the Arcadians, whose pitiful story is so pathetically told by Longfellow in "Evangeline," ended their wanderings.

story is so pathetically told by Longfellow in "Evangeline," ended their wanderings.

"From busy, bustling Canada to the quiet, dreamy country along the Atchafalaya river, that queer, half-asieep stream that flows out of the great 'Father of Waters'—what a journey and what a contrast in its termini! Such is the trip your correspondent recently took, and over nearly the same route travelled that ancient people, the Arcadians, many years before. Canada, below the forty-fifth parallel, is so lovely in September. Beautiful flowers, rivalling those of the tropics, delighted my astonished eyes; tender, green sward covered the parks, the like of which is possible with us (in Tennessee) only in the early spring. No wonder those poor exiles were heartbroken, many dying on the long, weary journey of pure home-sickness. Longfellow has put into his well-known poem, Evangeline, the sad story of their persecution and wandering, and not the least of the interest attaching to our trip were the associations connecting these diverse scenes with the almost real Evangeline and Gilbert. There, along the shores of Lake Pontchartrain, they wandered, and here, in the parish of Avoyelles, they passed each other without recognition.

"It is in this region we find the pre-historic earthworks of whose origin no one knows anything at all. The time-honored 'oldest inhabitant' can tell you nothing, except that his grandfather could tell him nothing about them, save that from his earliest remembrance they were there, and even then covered by immense trees, most of which were many decades old. Driving along the level, white, sandy roads, shaded by these magnificent trees, many of which are kingly magnolias, draped in the long grey moss, we gave rein to imagination and peopled this weird region with a brawny and fierce race who might have thrown up these mysterious earthworks, which, by the way, are not at all like the so-called Indian mounds found in many of the states, but more nearly resemble the breastworks thrown up during the Civil war.

they are yet a distinct people, and their half, or wholly uneducated French or Italian neighbor will readily point them out as 'Cajuns.' For poet or historian they afford rich material, and the theme has not yet been adequately used, much less ex-hausted." Rose Lane Brown, Athens, Tenn.

From Lake Ponchartrain to Tampa Bay is only a step for the imagination, and we are still in the Sunny South with our next correspondent.

"Half way down the western coast of Florida is Tampa Bay, noted as being the starting point of De Soto on his march across the continent. At the ing two hundred feet into the air. Inside the hotel is finished and furnished in magnificent style, statues, vases, hangings and furniture having been imported from Europe at great cost for its adornment. Indeed, it seems more like a palace than a hotel. Around it are gardens cared for by a skillful gardener and filled with rare and curious plants and trees. In the grounds are an opera house with a natatorium attached and an exhibition building in which is gathered a collection of Floridian plants, fish, birds, shells and curiosities.

"In 1893 cigar manufacturers from Havana and Key West began moving to Tampa, bringing with them a host of Cuban and Spanish workmen who, being an open-handed race, and earning from sixteen to sixty dollars per week, gave a great impetus to the general business of the city, and in a short time it had street railways, electric lights, and all the other appliances of a modern city. Its older industries have thriven as well, and at this time it is the largest fish market in the South; it ships thousands of boxes of oranges per day during the winter; from the northern portion of the state thousands of carloads of phosphate pass through the city to the deep water at Port Tampa, while nearly as many carloads of vegetables from the southern part pass through, bound northward.

It is the cigar trade, however, that gives Tampa its importance; bringing, as it does, two million dollars into the city in each year. This business also gives it the air of a Spanish city, since out of a population of twenty-five thousand at least twelve thousand are Cuban or Spanish. The Spanish language is heard everywhere, and is a regular branch of study in the city high school. Many Spaniards have business houses here to supply the needs of their countrymen who have settled in the city, and the localities which they inhabit have a very foreign appearance and atmosphere.

"During the Cuban rebellion many refugees settled here and made this point the center of activity

ARTHUR M. MURPHY, Andote, Florida.

Evidently our correspondents appreciate the delights of a mild climate at this bleak season of the year for here is another letter from our Southern coast.

coast.

"In the spring of the year, all through the northern belt of the United States, the farmers are at work making maple sugar and syrup from the sap which flows from the maple trees. In the fall the process of sugar making is transferred to the Southern states, and instead of the sap from trees being used it is the juice of the sugar cane which is boiled down to make the sweet product.

"When the sugar cane is growing it looks from a little distance like a field of corn, except that there are no ears upon the stalks. I got myself well laughed at by the planter and his men alike when, in my northernignorance, I asked what time of the year they planted the seed for a cane crop and what the seed was like. It seems that the seed of the cane plant does not mature except under very favorable conditions. The climate must be very moist and hot to have the seed come to maturity. I was told that there is no place in the United States where it matures in the open air. New plants are propagated from shoots. Each fall, when the crop is harvested, as many good vigorous stalks are saved out as the planter thinks he will need for the next year's new crop. These stalks are 'laid down' in long trenches, and covered with earth. In the spring when the ground begins to get warm they are uncovered. The long stalks have many joints, like a stalk of corn, and in almost every one of these joints the bud of a vigorous new shoot will be starting. The stalks are cut up into pieces so as to leave at least one good bud on each piece, and then these are set out in drills as corn is planted. Each bud grows to be a stalk of cane. In many cases, too, the roots of last year's crop are kept alive and another crop raised from them.

"Before the cane is cut the leaves, which are like corn leaves, are stripped off and saved for fodder. The stalks of cane are then cut and drawn to the place where they are to be ground. The stalks are full of rich, sweet juice, so delicious to taste that all through the fall everybody in the South 'chews cane.' One sees the stalks in the fruit shops in town, kept for sale just as fruit or candy is kept. Children going to school carry as much cane with them as they can beg, and men sitting on the fences chew cane and talk. Before the cane can be eaten the outer bark is peeled off with a jackknife, for this bark is hard and tasteless. The joints are next cut out, as these are tough. What is left is a crisp white morsel which looks and tastes like eelery steeped in maple syrup.

"The process called grinding is not grinding at all, but crushing. The stalks of cane are fed between two heavy steel rollers running close together. These squeeze the juice out of the stalks. This juice is boiled in large pans until it forms a thick yellow syrup. On the great plantations of Louisiana the process of sugar making is carried on in large factories with modern machinery. On somewhat smaller plantations the process is as shown in the picture I send. On such a plantation as this there would be raised each year from twenty to fifty acres of cane. A small engine runs the grinding machinery and a permanent brick arch under a shed furnishes conveniences

COMFORT, Augusta, TABLE RICH ART COVER

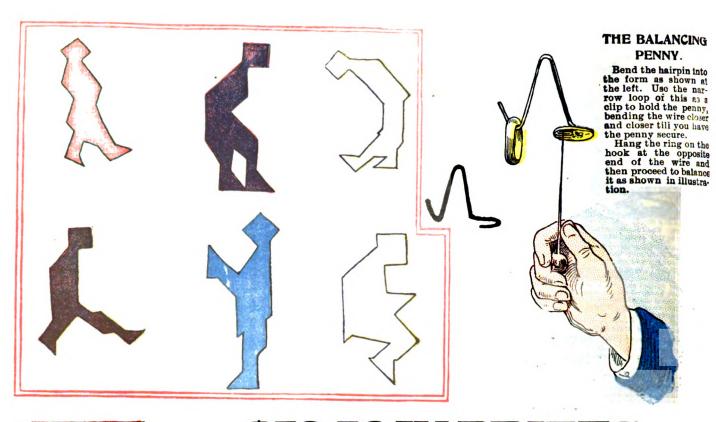

Armenian Needlework Designs So Closely Followed as to Defy Detection.

Read How You May Get this Splendid Japanese Gift for Your Own Home. The most gifted race in the world with the needle are the Orientals. For centuries the rich and varied designs worked by their hands have been the admiration and delight of chinery that would reproduce these rich designs of embossed embroidery and needlework, even to the delicate films of gold-thread work. Still more curious the Japanese obtained plans and made similar machinery, so that they have the addition of "cheap labor" to Yankee machinery. In this way the most delicate Armenian and Turkish needlework is imitated so closely that none but the expert, on close examination, reveals the minor points of imitation.

An Art Table Cover Free. We wish to introduce of and to accomplish this intend to actually give away these rich and ornamental Table Covers to our friends. We shall send a handsome cover, about two feet and a half square, of the richest and most pleasing designs, and being in appearance like the hand-made covers that Armenian experts sell for from $12 to $25 each, to one agent in each city or town who will sell for us only two boxes Nazone Salve at 25c. apiece. How to Build a Boat.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY H. EDWARD SWIFT.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher

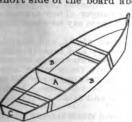

OST boys are looking ahead to the coming of summer and some are even planning what they will do. If a boy has a mechani-cal turn of mind nothing will give him more enjoyment and satisfaction than to build a boat. The following description will give all the in-struction necessary to build a boat twelve ft. long. Take ten or eleven boards not over 7-8 of an inch thick, 7 inches wide and about 13 feet long.

Also 2 boards 7-8 inch thick, 14 inches wide and 13 ft. long, free from knots. These are for the side boards and should be of good clear stock, of pine or cedar, so they can be bent alike.

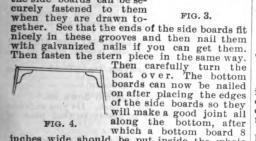

Cut a picce shaped like Fig. 1, the length over all being 4 feet, the width 12 inches, the length on the bottom side 3 feet and 6 inches. This is for a cross board. Make a similar piece of oak, if you can get it, 28 inches long, 10 inches wide, and the length of the bottom edge, 22 inches. This is for the stern piece.

The ends of each side board should be sawed off like the ends of the cross board making the short side of the board about 8 inches shorter than the longer.

than the longer. Beginning 4 feet from the ends of the side boards you wish for the stern end, taper the m back to 10 inches wide, on one side only. Set the side boards B. Fig. 2. wide, on one side only. Set the side boards BB, Fig. 2, on edge parallel with the longer edge uppermost and at about the middle place the cross board and with ropes draw the two ends of the side boards together, the other ends draw to the stern piece c., Fig. 2. Make a stern piece by cutting grooves in a piece of oak 16 inches long as shown in Fig 3.

These grooves should be 7-8 of an inch deep, so that the side boards can be securely fastened to them when they are drawn together. See that the ends of the side boards fit nicely in these grooves and then nail them with galvanized nails if you can get them.

of the side boards so they will make a good joint all along the bottom, after which a bottom board 8 inches wide should be put inside the whole length of the boat to stiffen the bottom. Of course you have to knock out the cross board to do this. It will be well to put brackets where the stern pieces joins the side boards on the top as in Fig 4. Then in the stern about 6 inches from the top edge nail a cleat on each side parallel to the top for a seat 14 inches wide, also put in a seat the same distance from the top edge distance from the top edge

5 feet from the stern and another half-way between this and the bow. Cover the bow of the boat 18 inches back from FIG. 5.

Cover the bow of the boat 18 inches back from the stern as shown in Fig. 5, and then fit two gunwale pieces 2 1-2 inches wide on the sides the whole length of the boat as shown at AA in Fig. 6. B in Fig. 6 shows the seat in place. These should be fitted at the bow as in Fig. 7, so as to give a finished effect to the whole structure. If it is not convenient to get row locks, round holes may be bored in the gunwales about 3 inches apart and 9 inches astern of each seat. The holes should be seveneighths of an inch in diamnotes should be seven-eighths of an inch in diam-eter and fitted with oak pins 6 inches long, so that when the pins are in place they will project about four inches above the gun-wale.

FIG. 7.

This boat should have a keel of oak seveneighths of an inch thick and two inches wide reaching from stern piece to stern with a wider triangular piece at the stern as shown in Fig 8.

to make the boat row steadier. This can be made into a sail boat by putting in a centerboard box 4ft. long and 10 inches wide as shown in Fig. 9 and then cut a hole lengthwise in the bottom of the boat 3 ft. and 8 inches long through the bottom, keel and inside board (this should be 1 inch wide) after which securely nail the DOX in place after having covered the bottom edges with white lead or thick paint. The centerboard box should be made to take a seven-eighths inch centerboard easily allowing for swelling. The board can be hinged as shown in Fig. 10 or can be used straight, simply sliding down the required depth. If hinged sliding down the required depth. If hinged shown in Fig. 10 or can be used straight, simply sliding down the required depth. If hinged as in Fig. 10 fasten a cord A. to the centerboard B. hung on the pin c. to raise and lower the beard as circumstances require. Make a rudder and tiller as in Fig. 11: the rudder should be 17 inches long and 12 inches wide, with a tiller 15 inches long all made of oak seven-eighths of an inch thick nicely finished and shellacked. The boat is now ready to paint as the owner may fancy. Cut a hole 4 inches in diameter 12 inches from the bow as shown in Fig. 5 and put a step in the bottom of the boat directly under this to support the mast, which should be about 12 ft. long, 4 inches in diameter at the base, slightly tapered to the top. The sail can be of No. 1 duck and should be cut as in Fig. 12 which will give ample sail for a boat of this style. If you wish to use a sprit, a pole one and one-fourth inches in diameter placed as shown in the cut and secured to the mast cut and secured to the mast by a loose loop is as easy as any thing to make, or you can use a boom and gaff, in which case the mast could be 18 inches longer and the FIG. 11.

base of the sail 2 ft. longer. The extra length of mast will allow for the hoisting of the sail which should be secured by wooden or iron hoops at intervals of one foot. The whole would probably cost complete about twelve dollars; without the centerboard, rudder mast and sail the boat would cost about six dollars. A good deal will delars. A good deal will depend upon the ability and good judgment of the boy who builds the boat as to what the boat looks like when finished, but if care is used and the foregoing FIG. 12. directions followed closely you will have a good boat and a fast sailer in smooth water.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 25 cents a year each. #### THE IDIOT'S STRANGE WARNING.

THE IDIOT'S STRANGE WARNING.

Ned Todd and his youthful companion sat with their backs to the window through which the baleful eyes of the Oklahoma bandit gleamed. It was now so dark that it is quite doubtful if they could have seen him, even if they had been looking in his direction.

Supper over, the two men rose from the table and walked to the front room. There lying on the floor kicking and chuckling, was the idiot. The youth paused a moment and gazed upon the wetched creature. Like some animal, he rolled upon the rug, sometimes chuckling and hugging it, as if it were the object of his warmest affections.

"Major, is he not a strange looking man?" asked Archie.

"Yes."

"And so unfortunate."

For a moment both stood and gazed at the idiot, who ceased his giggling and raising his head, gazed about the apartment with more shrewdness than they thought he possessed. Only Ned Todd, the Ranger, and Archie were in sight. On his elbows like a walrus he raised himself, and gazed about him for several moments, at last fixing his eyes on the youth before him. Then all of a sudden he fell down and began to giggle and roll over on his rug, kicking his feet about in every direction.

"Let us take a look at the horses, and see that they do not break through the corral, and stray off," said Todd.

The youth assented, and the two left the house. It was now quite dark. The moon was just beginning to rise, and the sky was cloudless, but there were so many shadows made by the tall forests, that it was even at this time almost dark.

"That is a very singular idiot," said the worth we show walked toward the horses.

"That is a very singular idiot," said the youth, as they walked toward the horses. "Yes he is."

"Did you notice how he looked at me?"
"I did." "Did you see what he did?"
"He looked at you."
"More than that."
"What was it?"
"He winked at me."

"He did?—and what did you do?"
"I winked back."
The border detective was silent for a few moments, and then said:

"Well it may only be the eccentricity of an the great gloomy old forest was lighted up by its soft, refulgent rays.

"Don't you think it very strange that we should find people living here?" Archie asked.

"Yes, somewhat," the border detective answered. "Yet there may be a reason for all this seclusion. This man probably thinks that the boomers will ultimately be expelled by the soldiers, and the best thing that he can do is to live apart by himself."

"The soldiers may never find him here."

"It would be an accident if they did."

"It would be an accident if they did."

"It would be an accident if they did."
They turned to retrace their steps to the house. The moon was high enough now to shed a glorious light upon the dark aisles and narrow paths of the forest.

Suddenly Archie Holland started back and clutched the arm of his companion.
"What is the matter?" Ned asked.

"I saw a form in the woods on our left flit-ting about."
"What was it like?"

"I only caught a glimpse of it, and cannot say exactly what it is like; but I believe it was of a twig, the border detective said:

"You were certainly mistaken, Archie. It could not have been a man or we would have could not have been a man or we would have heard him. It was more likely a bird flying about to find a roosting place."

"I don't know what it was," Archie answered. "But I think after our experience of the day, we had better keep a sharp lookout. Things have a very mysterious appearance here."

here."
"This Oklahoma mystery is deepening,"

Todd answered, and his brow gathered into retroubled knot of cords and wrinkles. As they wended their way to the house, the youth remembering his mission to this wilderness, sighed and mentally ejaculated:

"Oh father, father! where are you now, that I may fly to your side, and release you from bondage."

When they reached the house, they found the idiot asleep on his sheepskin rug, and their old host sat in one corner near the great open fireplace smoking his pipe.

A tallow dip candle burning on the mantel, but dimly lighted the room.

"Set down," growled the sullen host, pointing to a couple of chairs.

The weary travelers complied with his request, and Archie's eyes began to wander restlessly about the apartment. Over the door was a gun rack in which lay a rifle. Over the mantel was another gun rack and another gun. Standing in one corner of the room, leaning against the wall was a double-barreled shot gun. Then there were two or three pistol holsters, from which the butts of revolvers protruded, hanging from pegs on the wall.

"This solitary old man seems very well armed," thought Archie. He was about to speak to the border detective, when that personage turning to their host asked:

"How many sons have you?"

For a moment the old man seemed a little confused, but recovering himself, answered:

"Two."

"Where are they?"

"Down at the Boomers' camp."

"Where are they?"
"Down at the Boomers' camp."

"Down at the Boomers' camp."

There was nothing unreasonable in this, yet being in a land of mystery and danger, it was but natural that the detective should have his suspicions constantly on the alert.

Minutes glided by in silence. The old man sat in the corner smoking his pipe, and the idiot snored on the hearth. At last the host kicked the cripple saving:

The idiot chuckled and kicked his feet out as if he were highly delighted, and the host sank back in his heavy oaken chair and smoked.

The old man shrugged his shoulders and cast nervous glances behind him. After a few moments he said:

"Yes."
"Get the entire force here by midnight."
The chief bowed and withdrew. In three or four seconds he had disappeared into the dark, gloomy old forest.
In the meantime Ned Todd and Archie had

"Major," said the youth, thoughtfully, "if we had obtained more complete explanation from Oklahoma Peg, we could have determined on our course with certainty."

The detective who had been busy with his thoughts, said:

"It's all a mystery to me. I cannot get heads or tails of it. I wish I could understand it, but I can't."

For some moments all was quiet, and both men were busy thinking. Then the youth yawned and turned his eyes toward the miserable bed in the corner of the room. The detective asked him if he were sleepy.

"Yes, and tired, too," was the answer, "but do you think that we dare to go to sleep?"

"One of us must stay awake," he answered.

"There may be. In this wilderness we may face a thousand perils before we know it."

"You can sleep and I will take the first watch," said Archie.

"You will have to keep your eyes and ears open."

"I know it."

open."
"I know it."

"I know it."

There was a small window in the gable end of the house, from which they could get a partial view of the country and forest beyond. Here Archie took his position as guard. His companion, without removing his clothing, threw himself on the bed, one hand clasping the but of a revolver. the butt of a revolver.

"Let me m and i will tell you," and he chuckled in his old idiotic manner, as if the habit had so fastened itself upon him that he could not get rid of it. With scarcely any perceptible noise, notwithstanding his deformity, he entered the room. "They think me a fool," he said, pausing to press his hand upon his forehead. "Bryce, Burton, and Dyke all think me a fool, but I am not."

This was said in a scarcely audible whisper after the door had been closed. The two men were standing in front of the idiot gazing at him with deep interest. The poor fellow scened to be puzzling himself to gather up his scattered faculties, but after a few moments he again said:

"Who do you mean?" the detective asked, for the fellow had again made a pause. His manner seemed at once to change.

After a desperate struggle, he gathered up his scattered faculties, and concentrating his mind on the subject of which he intended to speak, he said in a whisper:

"Do you know that you are in danger?"

"I suspect it, but did not really know," answered the detective.

"You are in deadly peril."

"You are in deadly peril."
"From whom?"
For a moment the strange man seemed lost in reflection. He rubbed his scarred, misshapen face with his deformed hand, and "Have you heard of Captain Snell?"

"That's the name he goes by. He is the mys-terious man of Oklahoma."
"Where is he? Is he the man whom we found here?" asked Archie.

"No, no," the cripple answered, shaking his head. "He has not been in sight, but he will be before morning. This is his stronghold, and if you remain here you will not live to see sunrise. It would be better to lie down and sleep in a den of wolves, than here amid these Oklahoms outlaws." homa outlaws."

CHAPTER V.

THE TRAVELERS LOSE THEIR HORSES.

The cripple stood for a moment gazing up at the ceiling, as if he were trying to gather his scattered ideas. Beneath his rough, scarred face, shaggy, unkempt hair and beard, the close observer could readily discover the wreck of what were once exceedingly fine features.

Archie was sure there was something familiar about him, but he was at a loss to say what it

Archie was sure there was something familiar about him, but he was at a loss to say what it was. As he was gazing at him, the youth was saying to himself:
"Did I ever meet that unfortunate man before? No, surely not. That face is strange to me, and yet there seems something about it that is familiar."

The cripple, in the meanwhile, realizing the danger of the travelers, said:
"You must go away from here. You must fly for your lives. Every moment that you delay only increases your danger. They are coming to kill you. I heard them say so when they thought me asleep."

The cripple then turned about, and despite his clubbed feet, noiselessly and rapidly created own the narrow, cramped stairway. It seemed impossible for him to move those mis-shapen feet and hands without making some noise, but he did so. When he had gone, Archie turned to his companion and said:
"What does he mean?"

For a moment Ned Todd stood staring at the

"What does he mean?"

For a moment Ned Todd stood staring at the half open door, his whole attention given to the faculty of hearing. There was not a sound to break the calm, and after having assured himself that there was no one to hear him, he said.

"His warning may be only the insane twaddle of an idiot, yet it is sufficient for us to give it some consideration. We will make a careful examination of the premises. What can you see from that window?"

"Nothing but the forest, and moon in the sky."

Todd carefully closed the door.
"The moon shines brightly, and we ought to be able to get a view of something from the window."

"But there is a big hackberry tree growing almost against the house, which cuts off all view in the rear."

"We can utilize that tree," said Todd coming to the window.

to the window.
"How?"

"Make it a ladder to climb down on."
"I had not thought of that. Do you suppose it will be necessary to resort to that plan of escape?"
"Yes."

"Yes."

"Why, there is no sign of danger. There is not a single sound that would alarm any one."

"But it is sometimes most dangerous when there is the least noise," said the border detective. They had brought their repeating rifles with them to their rooms, and their pistols were about their waists, so that they were well armed.

"Had we better look after the horses?" esked "Had we better look after the horses?" asked the youth.

"Yes, but there may be more danger in that than we think. I do not feel like running away, for, if this is the rendezvous of a banditti, as the idiot says, it is my duty to ferret them out, and bring them to justice. If it is not, then we have no cause to be running away."

"What would you advise?" asked Archie.
"Go out and reconnoitre."
"Well, I am ready."
"The other can

"Well, I am ready."
"But only one must go. The other can remain here and keep a sort of guard," said the border detective.
"Is it not bad policy to divide our forces?"

"Is it not bad policy to divide our forces asked Archie.
"No, if these are bandits, they will not make their appearance before midnight."
"Who will reconnoitre?"
"I will go," said Ned Todd. "It may require some experience and shrewdness to manage business outside. In here, all that is necessary is courage and coolness, which with you are natural."

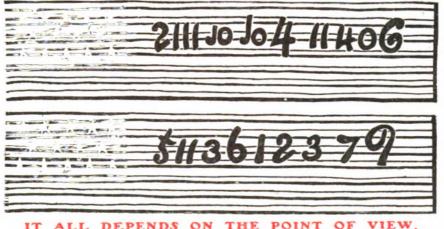

natural."
Going to the window the border detective climbed out upon the branches of the tree.
His movements were so cautious that he scarce made any noise at all. Archie stood within the apartment watching the man as he descended the tree and disappeared from view. When within a few feet from the earth, the border detective dropped silently to the ground and rose and hurried away to the horses.
"The whole country has been so dangerous

"The whole country has been so dangerous to good borses," he thought, "that I am inclined to the opinion our animals are in more danger than Curselves."

"We have had a long, hard day's travel," said the border detective, "can you show us at once to our beds?"
"Umph, hump!" he growled rising and tak-ing a candle from the mantel. "Foller me."
Up a narrow, cramped flight of stairs into an attic chamber the weary travelers were con-ducted.

As they left the room, the idiot giggled and chuckled, rolling over on the floor in apparent delight. At the moment they left the apartment, a dark, sinister face appeared at the narrow window.

"I here 'en now" a voice whispered so

This seemed to amuse the idiot, for he screamed and chuckled until the face had disappeared from the window, when he once more became quiet and settled down to his

The footsteps of the host could be heard descending the stairway. There was a smile on his sinister face, and he shook his great shaggy head as if he were well pleased with what had been done.

"Tap, tap, tap!" The tapping was at the rear of the building, and so very light was it that the host could scarce believe at first that he heard it at all. He listened a moment to assure himself, but it came again with such distinctness that he knew some one was there awaiting him. An hour passed and the youthful guard sat nodding in the chair by the window. Not a sound which could be called suspicious had as yet fallen on his ears. His eyes grew heavy, and despite himself closed. Before he knew it he was dozing.

The ranger was cautious, yet he could not but believe that it was really a friend. An enemy would not have come to them in this way. He carefully opened the door, so as to get a glimpse of the person without. He was astonished to discover standing before him the idiot cripple. The amazement of both Todd and Archie can be better imagined than described.

The idiot put his crooked, mis-shapen fingers to his lips and whispered:

Comfort Clubs.

For the benefit of our readers who live in the smaller towns and remote communities, Comfort proposes the organization of Comfort Clubs whose object shall be to add to the comfort of living by bringing people together for their mutual instruction, improvement and amusement.

Knowing that social pleasures are lacking in the smaller places more because people do not know how to organize and what to do that is interesting and pleasing, than because they do not care for such things, Comfort will undertake to suggest ways and means by which the young people, at least, may pass many winter evenings which would otherwise hang heavily.

First: The clubs to be known as Comfort Clubs are

First: The clubs, to be known as Comfort Clubs, are to have their membership from among subscribers to COMFORT, and ten persons or less may constitute a Club. In communities where there are more than ten eligibles, Clubs A, B. C etc., may be organized, the objects of these divisions being to make it possible for sets of persons to make up their own crowds, for such meetings as they may wish to have. But each month there must be a regular meeting of the whole Club at which all members may attend and take part in the exercises.

may attend and take part in the exercises.

Second: The monthly meeting should be held in some large room (church or town hall) and members are to read, recite, sing play on some instrument, or act a short piece, the whole to conclude with some interesting game which COMFORT will present. COMFORT will also provide the program each month for the monthly meeting, so that members need only carry out the program which will be furnished them. Division meetings may be held at private houses of members of the divisions, and once a week if so desired.

Third. The officers of Comfort Clube shell.

Once a week it so desired.

Third: The officers of Comfort Clubs shall consist of President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, four in all, and to be elected by the Club, once a year. There are to be no fees of any kind, but if at any time the Club wishes to raise money for any charity, small admittance may be charged at the usual monthly meeting. This can only be done by vote of the Club. Every member shall be entitled to invite two persons, not members, to attend any meeting, general or division.

Fourth: Each member shall wear a badge or button indicating membership, Comfort agreeing to furnish appriate badges without cost to members.

priate badges without cost to members.

These general rules, which will be modified and improved as the needs of Clubs develop, are now given as a basis upon which to organize the pioneer Clubs, and Comport will be pleased to hear from our lady readers all over the land concerning their will ingness to undertake the good work. Comport will also be glad to render all the assistance in its power to aid the cause of making life cheerier and brighter and increasing good will and good fellowship among mankind. A special prize will be awarded to the first club organizing and reporting to this office, which organization may take place immediately upon receipt of this notice. Various annual prizes, to be determined later, will be awarded to Clubs for excellence in attendance, numbers, &c.

Address all communications to Comfort Club Editor, Comport, Augusta, Maine.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Let the person undertaking the organization notify six or more subscribers to Comport at the same postoffice to meet at a designated house, or room, and when they have come together, simply state the object of the organization of the club, as announced in Comport and get the sense of the meeting as to organizing. If a majority favor it, proceed at once to organization by naming two or more persons, male or female as candidates for President, first. Then pass slips of blank paper around for each person to write thereon the name of his or her choice for the office, and the one receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared president. Proceed in the same way for Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer. Then the person who has called the meeting will retire and the new officers will take charge, the President in the chair, conducting the meeting, and the Secretary acting as clerk making the minutes. The President will announce the program and call off the order of business naming those who are set down as taking individual parts.

A Comfort Club Game

A Comfort Club Game.

A lively game as part of the evening's amusements is to see who can thread the greatest number of needles in the least time, the elderly people being allowed to use glasses. Pass around to all in the company pieces of thread about a foot long with a large knot in one end. Then have three or four plates with a paper of needles emptied in each put around the room where they can be conveniently got at by the threaders. At a signal from the President or whoever is master of ceremonies, the threading begins and continues five minutes. The needles on each string are then counted, and the person having threaded the highest number of needles is given some simple prize, whatever it may be. The person having the lowest number gets the "booby" prize, which may be a tin horn or a monkey climbing a stick, or any ridiculous thing. If two or more persons have the same number they are to draw straws to determine who is the winner.

The Tallest and Shortest Couple Game.

or more persons have the same number they are to draw straws to determine who is the winner.

The Tallest and Shortest Couple Game.

As this game is somewhat short another to go with it, and which will cause much sport, is to see who the tallest and the shortest couples in the company. In this game a young lady passes a hat filled with slips of paper numbered from one up to as many as are necessary, among the gentlemen, and a young gentleman passes similar slips among the ladies. Each one takes a number until all are supplied. Then the young man having a certain number say ten, goes around among the ladies until he finds the one having the corresponding ten, and they pair off. All the others do the same as they find their numbers and when all are paired, they go by couples before the President who measures the height of the gentleman and lady, with a yard stick or foot rule, or takes and adds their combined height. This is done with each couple and the tallest couple wins the prize, while the shortest one gets the "booby" prize. This may be varied by weighing the couples, if the grocer will loan the club his scales for the evening. The heaviest couple wins the prize, the lightest getting the booby. This game affords great sport and will easily occupy all the spare time. It may do for a whole evening, if there is a large number of persons in attendance.

It was his HEART, you know, it had been troubling him for a year. "How often we hear this story of neglected heart disease! It is increasing! 69 hearts in every hundred are wrong! Yet people won't seem to admit that it really is their heart but go on doctoring for something else when by the well known signs of Nervousness, fluttering, palpitation, skipping beats, choking, nightmare, indigestion, pain in heart and side and many others, the poor heart is saying, "Iam sick. Help me help me!" And how strange that they don't send help when it means life or death to them and when the heart can surely be made right again. Not one case in 500 is incurable. How is your heart? You can tell better perhaps than a doctor, for you know your symptoms better than you can tell him. If you have one of them, or the least suspic ion that your heart is wrong, don't wait! Find out! Even if you know that you have a settled heart disease which nothing has helped, don't give up! there is help!!

Ned Todd.

At this moment a noise like the crackling of a dry stick in a thicket attracted his attention.
On his right was some underbrush so thick that the eye could scarce penetrate three paces into it, even in broad daylight. It was in this thicket that the detective heard the crackling sound.

sound.

He dropped to the earth as silently as falls the snowflake, and, crouching on his hands and knees, he held his ready cocked revolver to defend himself if it became necessary. There could be no mistake about the matter, some one was in the thicket. After a few moments the faint rustling of bushes came to his ears. Some man or beast was within that thicket, and from the caution exercised, he satisfied himself that it was a man.

Tramp, tramp, tramp, very faintly yet distinctly came the slow tread of feet, accompanied by the slight rustling of bushes, as of some one parting them with his hands.

There was a tall bunch of grass but a few feet away, and behind this the detective crept, crouching low to the ground, just so he could see around the tuft of grass.

A tall, powerful man, whose face was so completely concealed by a broad-brimmed hat as to render his features invisible, stepped from the thicket not ten paces from where the concealed man lay. He was attired in the usual frontier costume, and carried a rifle in his hand. The newcomer paused a moment to gaze about him.

him.
"That infernal woman will ruin all yet," he

"That infernal woman will ruin all yet," he growled in an undertone.
"What woman is he talking about?" thought Ned Todd. He kept his pistol ready aimed at the stranger's breast, and could at any moment have sent a bullet to his heart, but as yet he had no positive assurance that he was an enemy. Even if he was one of the banditti it would be better to watch him and see what he would do. what he would do.

what he would do.

The stranger waited a few moments as if hesitating which way to go. Perhaps he was never in greater peril in his life. Had he discovered the man crouching upon the ground, and taken a single step toward him, it would have been his last. But after a few moments he turned off at a right angle, and made a circuit of the house.

ne turned on at a right angle, and made a circuit of the house.

"I will have to be careful. The woods are full o' them," said Ned Todd.

He went carefully along the edge of the thicket, until he was in a position to get a view of the old corral where their horses had last been seen. But as he was about to emerge from the thicket there came a low tan tan from thicket, there came a low tap, tap, from the dark wood.

"That's a signal," thought the detective.
A moment later it was answered, not half a dozen paces away.

"Hist," said a low, cautious voice.

"Who's that?"

"Dyke."

Ned Todd was near enough to hear both. They met at a spot not ten paces away in full view of the concealed man. "Boydston, where is cap?" asked the man who had called himself Dyke. "Not fur."
"Have they escaped?"

"No."
"D' they suspect us?"
"I guess not; the old house is as silent as the grave. When mornin' comes there'll either be two new mounds or two more bodies in the black hole."
"Have they much?"
"Nothing."
"Then why bother with 'em?"
There was a muttered expression, which the concealed man could not catch, and then he heard his own name pronounced.
"What! is he here?"
"There haint a bit o' doubt o' it."

"There haint a bit o' doubt o' it."

"There haint a bit o' doubt o' it."

"Then we got to get rid o' him, and it will have to be managed in such a way that he does not drop on us. If he should we are gone."

They talked in an undertone for several moments, so that the detective from his place of concealment was unable to hear a word that they said. At last they moved off and disappeared in the darkness.

"Now to see if the horses are safe, and then to get back and warn Archie of our danger," said Ned Todd, as he began to cautiously make his way through the jungle of vines and grass.

He finally got near enough to the corral to discover that the horses were gone. He made the discovery with no little alarm. It was plainly evident now that the enemy had determined on securing their victims at all hazards. Todd wheeled about and started toward the house. Before he had taken a dozen steps in that direction, a voice said:
"Stop! surrender, or you are a dead man." At the same moment a pair of strong arms were thrown about him, and the cold muzzle of a pistol thrust against his temple.

CHAPTER VI.

A STRANGE DISCOVERY.

Alone in the dark attic attended only with sad reflections, Archie Holland patiently awaited the return of his companion. We all awated the return of his companion. We all know how in times of great anxiety the moments seem ages. At such times the thoughts can conjure up a thousand fantastic dangers. Out of the darkness we seem to see monsters determined on our destruction.

Archie Holland was no coward, and when he felt these superstitious fears creeping on him he threw them off, and, starting to his feet, stood at the window looking upon the moonlit forest.

There were many things to occupy the mind of Archie Holland at this time. His father's mysterious disappearance, his supposed death, and the story of the man Frank Erwin, that he was still alive and a prisoner in Oklahoma. The mystery had a saddening effect on the youth, and he wondered if this strange rendezvous, Oklahoma Peg, and Captain Snell, could have any connection whatever with his missing father.

It was but natural that his mind should take in the tragedy of the day. He wondered why the man Miller was traveling alone with his daughter through the wilderness, and where was the young lady whom he had sworn to rescue? A slight noise on the ground below at this moment attracted his attention.

"What is that? A man's footsteps as I live," he said leaning forward and gazing out into the darkness, yet being careful not to bring himself in range of a bullet. A few moments' silence ensued, and again footsteps were heard.

"Whist," came from below. It was but natural that his mind should take "Whist," came from below.

"All right," some one answered in a whisper.
"It's not all right," thought the youth, cocking his pistol and holding it in his hand. There were two dark forms below, and he knew that neither was the border detective. They must be enemies.

Archie dropped on one knee close by the window and listened.

'Are they here yet?" a voice asked in a whisper.
"Bagged as neat as you please," was the an-

"Where are the others?"

"Coming."
The youth appreciated the fact that his position was becoming every moment more critical. He must get out of this place, or he would soon be surrounded by enemies and his escape impossible.
"Are ye sure it's Todd?" a voice from below

"Hush, don't make so much noise. You'll be heard."
"Oh, they're asleep."

"Oh, they're asleep."
"May be not."
"Of course they are," said the man, who was evidently the more careless of the two. "If they'd been awake we'd a had a shot from 'em before this time."
They were standing beneath the very tree by which Ned Todd had descended. Archie could have hit either with his pistol, but how many more of the banditti were near, waiting for him, he had no means of knowing, and dared not begin the fight while his companion was not begin the fight while his companion was away.

The two men were in view but a moment, and then they disappeared around the house.
"There is no need for me to stay here until I am caught like a rat in a trap," thought Archie as they disappeared. "I had better try to escape, and run my chances of finding Major Todd."

He opened the door, and with a cocked revolver in his hand, crept down the narrow, crooked stairway. In spite of all his caution the stairway would creak. It was very dark, and he once or twice came near stumbling, but and he once or twice came near stumbling, but with very little confusion, regained his equilibrium. All this trouble, however, prolonged the time.

When half way down he halted, for he was certain he heard a door open in some part of the house. In his imagination he could see the dark assassins, like Macbeth, creeping upon their intended victims. For a few moments he waited in the narrow stairway, pistol in hand. He thought he saw a dark robed form glide across the open space revealed by the cracks in the door at the foot of the stairs. But a brief investigation convinced him that it was only his imagination.

Nevertheless stealthy footsteps could be heard in different parts of the house, and the air was filled with strange whispers and murmurs.

"There is some mischief brewing," said the youth, as he reached the door of the front room. A few smoldering embers were in the fireplace, giving forth a dull glow of light, through the pale gray ashes that covered them. Through the gloom of the dark room the form of the cripple could be seen lying on his sheepabin rug, evidently asleep.

Archie tried the front door, but it was se-curely locked and bolted.

"I must get out of here some way," he thought. Then he remembered the window. But when he reached it, he made a discovery that was new to him. The sashes of the window were of iron, instead of painted wood as he had at first supposed. The youth was about to try the front door again, when the sound of voices came to his ears.
"Some one is out there, that won't do," he

"Some one is out there, that won't do," he thought.

"No, no, no," muttered the idiot cripple, rolling over on the rug and kicking and giggling in half suppressed glee.

"That fellow is awake," said the youth to himself. "Had I not better appeal to him?" But at that moment the idiot began snoring so loudly that Archie concluded that after all he must be asleen.

He groped his way across the room, and reached the door, which he found unlocked and opened. But it only led to another apartment, if possible even more dark than the Voices could be heard in some passage, closet, or adjoining apartment. They were not very loud, but every word could be distinctly heard.

"It's time they were all here now," said one, "there is no need o' waitin' any lorger. Let's

"It's time they were all here now," said one, "there is no need o' waitin' any longer. Let's go up and knock 'em on the head."
"No, wait for Cap."
"Cap, thunder! he's too slow! When I've got work to do, I want it done and over with!"
"But we'd better be a little careful in this Cap." case."
"Why?"

"Why?"
"Them fellers are perfect tigers. Cap an' some of the boys hev been shooting at 'em all day, but could neither hit 'em or drive 'em out o' the country. They say't one o' them is Major Todd, the border detective."
"Oh thunderation, he can't be here!"
"Cap says he is."
"Then we will need all the band."

Then we will need all the

"Then we will need all the band."
"Guess we'd better go a little keerful."
"Let's go where we kin see somethin'."
They had been talking in low, earnest tones yet so as to be heard by Archie, but now began to move away. The creaking of boards could be heard by which Archie knew that they were getting farther and farther away. It now occurred to him that he could possibly effect his escape by following the men. He began groping his way around the apartment, and at last reached the door.

He tried it, and found it also unlocked.

Good fortune seemed favoring him. Again

"Yes, yes, come on," said a voice from with-

"There! trouble has begun," said some one.

"Ned Todd is in danger, I've not a moment to lose," thought Archie.

With the intention of running to the rescue With the intention of running to the rescue of his companion, he started to the next door in order to get out of the house, but, when he was only half way over, the floor suddenly gave way beneath him, and he fell down, down, alighting with a thump, that almost took the breath out of his body, on the ground at the foot of the stairs of a cellar or dungeon. The

No voice answered, but there was another and still more perceptible movement.

"Speak out or I will fire," said the youth.

A piteous groan came to his ears, half smothered, as if it were uttered with great difficulty.

Thrusting his fingers into his vest pocket, he drew out a match which he struck. It flared up, lighting the gloomy dungeon.

No wonder Archie Holland started back with an exclamation of horror and wonder. Before Archie hastened to her side, and holding his pistol between his knees cut the bonds that bound the captive.

"You are free," he said in a whisper.

"Thanks," came in a faint response.

"What is your name?" he asked.

"Was your father killed to-day?"

"Yes, sir," and he could hear her sobbing faintly.

"Coo Goo."

The popular "Goo Goo" Winking Eye is what you must wear on your coat or vest if you want to cut out all the other fellows and mash out all the other fellows and mash the pretty girls. You can engage in conversation and slyly turn back your coat lapel and wink your "Goo Goo" eye so easily you will win the girl and fool the other fellow or if a friend is telling a funny story that is old and stale or not just true, you can bring your winking eye into play

The People's Poet.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT

HE poems of Ella Wheeler Wilcox may not reach the highreach the high-est degree of literary and poetic perfec-tion, but they are strong in hu-man sympathy, and they appeal to the great mass of the common people. They are often of the kind that men cut out and tuck away in their vest pockets, and that children speak in school. Some in school. Some of them have been set to music, and people like to sin g them. They appeal to the heart, and they often voice great truths. They are more widely copied than the poems of any other woman writer in America. It is doubtful if any poem of recent years written by an American poet has been more widely copied than Ella Wheeler Wilcox's poem entitled "Solitude," which begins with—

"Laugh, and the world laughs with you:

copied than Ella Wheeler Wilcox's poem entitled "Solitude," which begins with "Laugh, and the world laughs with you;

Weep, and you weep alone,
For the sad old earth must borrow its mirth,
But has trouble enough of its own.
Sing, and the hills will answer;
Sigh, and it is lost on the air;
The echoes bound to a joyful sound,
But shrink from voicing care."

Ella Wheeler Wilcox came "out from the West." She was born in Johnstown, Wisconsin, about forty years ago, and all of the years of her childhood and young womanhood were spent in the West. She began to write at a very early age, and from the first her work was popular. The first poem for which she ever received payment appeared in one of the Leslie publications, and then the began to write for several eastern family periodicals. It was not until 1883 that she wrote "Solitude," a poem that brought her more prominently before the public than anything she had written up to that time. The poem was first published in the New York Sun, and its author was paid the munificent sum of five hundred dollars for it. The poem was suggested to Ella Wheeler while she was visiting a friend in Madison, Wisconsin. This friend had suffered a great bereavement, and it was while dressing for a ball that Ella Wheeler thought of how quickly one turns from sorrow to sunshine, and the poem was the result.

Another almost equally popular poem, containing but two stanzas, is the one entitled "Take Courage," It is the poem with which William J. Bryan concludes his book and it voices a truth that no one can deny.

"Let those who have failed to take courage,
Though the enemy seemed to have won,

"Let those who have failed to take courage,
Though the enemy seemed to have won,
Though his ranks are strong, if he be in the wrong,
The battle is not yet done;
For, sure as the morning follows
The darkest hour of the night,
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.
O man, bowed down with labor,
O woman, young yet old,
O heart, oppressed in the toiler's breast
And crushed by the power of gold;
Keep on with your weary battle Against triumphant might.
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right."
Mrs. Wilcox's "Poems of Passion," publish-

Until it is settled right."

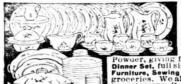

Mrs. Wilcox's "Poems of Passion," published about twenty years ago, created a good deal of discussion, but they are not the poems that made her reputation or that her friends care for most. One of her favorite poems is "My Creed." It is a creed to which all can subscribe and it would be well if we could all live the truths contained in its brief and simple lines which are as follows:

which are as follows:

"Who giveth love to all,
Pays kindness for unkindness, smiles for frowns,
And lends new courage to each fainting heart,
And strengthens hope and scatters joy abroad,
He, too, is a redeemer—son of God."

He, too, is a redeemer—son of God."

Ella Wheeler was married sixteen years ago to Robert M. Wilcox, a prosperous business man of Meriden, Connecticut, and her home since her marriage has been in New York excepting during the summer and fall months when she lives in a charming home of her own at Short Beach, Connecticut. She is a firm believer in the gospel of cheerfulness and one does not find morbid notes in her songs. She believes also in the still higher gospel of healthfulness, and nothing gives her greater pleasure than to know that she has sent forth a poem that has been helpful to some one. She has many letters received from those to whom her poems have been helpful by inspiring them with strength to fight the battle of life.

A REMARKABLE ENDORSEMENT Of the Unequalled Qualities of the CORNISH PIANO

The Hon. HORACE N. ALLEN, United States Minister to Korea.

United States Minister to Korea.

Mr. Allen who represents the United States at Seoul, Korea, purchased a Cornish piano in 1894. After an ocean voyage of some 16,000 miles, and usage for nearly eight years, subjected to the extreme heat and dampness of the Korean climate, writes as follows:

Legation of the United States of America, Sirs:

Seoul, Korea.

I wish to inform you of the satisfaction I have had I from the Cornish Piano you sent me in 1894. It was a wise relection for this climate. It has rtood the severe rainy seasons most remarkably. For four years my two boys practiced two hours daily upon it and for two years it has had a pianola attached to it and it has had to do steady service. During all this time it has only been tuned once owing to the absence of piano tuners. A tuning would not hurt it now, and yet it is not particularly out of tune. This record seems to surprise everyone, and I consider it worthy of mentioning it to you.

(Signed) HORACE N. ALLEN, U. S. Minister.

The eclipse falls in the 18th, Jupiter in the 9th, Venus near the meridian in the 10th, while Mercury is on the cusp of the 11th house in which are found the conjoined luminaries and Mars.

Happily for our country. Mercury ruler of the scheme and the benevolent planets are the highest elevated ones in the figure and continue the good promises for us as a nation. Mars so near the Sun and Moon detracts somewhat from the measure of according opposition to either measures or methods of the Chief Executive. There will be bitter debates and unpleasant criticism of the Administration in Congress, and Saturn in the 8th tends to show either friction in the Cabinet or some change in that official family.

A Total Eclipse of the Moon occurs at about 42 minutes of 1 o'clock in the afternoon of the 22nd of the month. This eclipse is not visible in the United Propagation of the Administration of the Europe Asia the service of the Congress of the Sun and Mercury, ruler of the scheme, each afflicted by the fiery Mars, he being close to the Sun and Mercury ruler of the scheme, each afflicted by the fiery Mars, he being close to the Sun and Mercury are the 9th cusp. CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR APRIL, 1902.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR APRIL, 1902.

APRIL 1—Tuesday. The morning hours are contentious and fractious and invite moderation of all hasty impulses in social, domestic and business affairs; the time promotes combustion and fires, and explosions as the month opens will be quite likely. After the early part of the day conditions improve rapidly. See that the noon and early afternoon hours are given the preference for all the major moves of the day; especially should literary enterprises be diligently pushed and mental labors will be remarkably successful and satisfactory. Crowd all commercial contracts, urge correspondence and adjustment of accounts; make written agreements, encourage educational matters, and begin mathematical and secientific labors of magnitude.

2—Wednesday. The morning gives baffling condi-

2—Wednesday. The morning gives baffling condi-tions such as arrests or hinders progress in matters of consequence, particularly if connected with buildings or lands. After ten in the morning let every energy be put forth for prosecution of business, especially such as con-cerns machinery, chemistry, or any of the manufactur-ing enterprises of life.

3—Thursday. This is one of the best days of the month for beginning of the less than the contraction.

certs macninery, chemistry, or any of the manufacturing enterprises of life.

3.—Thursday. This is one of the best days of the month for beginning affairs of magnitude and importance. Reculus advises his friends to improve the moments of this day to their fullest extent. It is especially recommended for the beginning of long journeys, milling operations, metal working, and the extensive manufacture, purchase or sale of machinery. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday then these suggestions apply with even greater force and thou mayst reckon with good assurance upon a season of unusual prosperity. Buy goods for trade, engage in new enterprises; deal with public officials, judges, counsellors, ecclesiastics and traders in wool and woolens. The day and time are particularly favorable for persons born about the 1st of February, 2nd of June, or 5th of October or December of past years, and such persons have in these passing weeks marked increase of friends, improved health and unexpected and more favorable business advantages and benefits, many making benevolent changes in business or removals.

4.—Friday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday with 4—Friday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday with unabated energy, giving preference, if any, to business pertaining to the elegant and decorative in life; make personal applications for favor from public officials and governing officers of large organizations or corporations.

5—Saturday. A day of no special promise though somewhat conducive to rashness, peevishness and excitability; especially to persons born about the $1\text{h} of March, 11\text{th} of September or $1\text{h} of October, of past years, Let all such keep strong check upon all impulses of an aggressive or contentious character just at this time or serious controversies may result.

6 Sunday. Specially conducive to mental eccentricities and indulgences in the imaginative and marvelous in literature; the evening is the best part of the day, particularly for study and reflection and mental efforts of 7—Monday. Use the forenoon of this day for moves of importance in connection with houses or lands or as to mining enterprises; execute wills, appoint trustees, engage with printers and urge all literary labors and general correspondence; buy goods for trade in the afternoon, when also make applications for financial advantages or favor from persons of wealth or prominence in banking circles.

S-Tuesday. Partial Eclipse of the Sun. Keep thy tongue under restraint during the better part of this day, nor be rash in decision in be siness engagements; quartels are easily provoked and violence will abound. It is no time to begin any important undertaking. Seek favor from persons noted for eccentricity of dress or habits

9-Wednesday. Let the musician and artist vigorously improve this day; choose the time for decorating buildings and dealing in decorative wares of all kinds; have no business transactions with money lenders or persons connected with patents.

10—Thursday. Shun correspondence in the opening hours of this day when correspondence relating to money matters is likely to prove unfortunate and annoying; use the afternoon for business connected with real estate or in reference to the property of deceased persons.

11-Friday. Begin the day early and urge all undertakings of a scientific, literary or artistic nature and press all general business; the afternoon is less to be depended upon for any of the polite avocations or musical or dramatical engagements.

or dramatical engagements.

12—Saturday. A very excellent day; use the forenoon for replenishing thy stock in trade and for dealing with bankers, chemists, manufacturers, carpenters, machinists, surgeons, dentists and engineers, also for seeking promotion in the public service.

13—Sunday. A day in which the musical portion of religious worship will be unusually happy and effective; conditions contribute special enjoyment of the elegant in literature and art and render courtesies between the sexes particularly agreeable.

literature and art and render courtesies between the sexes particularly agreeable.

14—Monday. The forenoon is the best part of this day and should be given preference for matters of most consequence; as the day advances, however, a malevolent train of influences will prevail when no important beginning should be made; give thy landlord a wide berth nor have anything to do with real estate matters or with persons in the dirty or laborious avocations; the late hours are particularly evil and much violence and crime are induced, when also fires are to be carefully guarded against; make no application for favor or advantage from persons in authority during this day; let all persons have care against exposing themselves to danger in wells, mines, or other underground places, especially if born about the 17th of January, 15th of April, 18th of July, or 17th of October, of past years. Such persons should look carefully to their affairs, lest by their own recklessness or haste they invite litigation and experience misfortune and loss, or in some cases suffer violent hurts or diseases; such persons are now generally excitable, contentious and quarrelsome; they are admonished that patience and discretion would prove profitable allies in the present juncture of their affairs.

15—Tuesday. Do not be in haste to begin thy duties on this day as baffling and disappointing conditions thwart success; the middle hours are the best ones and should be employed in preference to other parts of the day for the principal moves in life.

16-Wednesday. Push correspondence in the early morning hours, but keep a sharp watch over the finances in the middle hours when losses of money or valuables are quite probable; beware of signing any promise to pay or of binding thyself as surety for another.

17—Thursday. Personal applications for favor from public authorities are more likely to succeed on this day than usual and the day is excellent as well for all the honorable undertakings of life, especially those concerned with great manufacturing enterprises.

cerned with great manufacturing enterprises.

18—Friday. This day should be avoided for wooing or wedding, for conditions are decidedly treacherous and evil in this respect; many very strange and ill-assorted marriages are effected at this time, and disappointment, poverty and unhappiness will fall to the lot of the greater number who now assume the matrimonial voke; ladies should not allow any alluring prospect of riches to influence them at this time to make any engagement of the above nature. This is especially true of ladies claiming this as their birthday or if born about the middle of January, July, or October, of past years.

19—Saturday. The morning hours are the poorest

19—Saturday. The morning hours are the poorest but after nine in the forenoon matters concerned with building, excavating and construction should be vigorously pushed, when also dealings should be had with agriculturalists, mining concerns, plumbers, ship-builders and all classes of men engaged in the dirty and laborious avocations.

20-Sunday. One of the promising Sabbaths of the spring months, particularly conducive to the success of religious efforts and contributing physical vitality and buoyancy of spirit. Church matters are particularly favored 21—Monday. Arise betimes and dilligently urge thy several pursuits during the first two-thirds of this day, when conditions especially favor all dealings with persons of wealth and distinction, also all transactions with banks and monied institutions; use the afternoon for dealing with public men and officers of large corporations; mental labors in the night hours will be very laborious and generally unsatisfactory; indeed, the coming twenty-four hours have little to offer of a satisfactory character; some bad burglary and violence is probable during the night hours when fres prove fierce and destructive.

22—Tuesday. Total Eclipse of the Moon. Avoid contructive.

22—Tuesday. Total Eclipse of the Moon. Avoid contention and do nothing hastily at this time; some bad fires and accidents now occur. Treachery and deceit are abroad, especially in the commercial and mercantile world, and REGULUS cautions close scrutiny of signatures to commercial paper and against a too ready belief in representations; both tongue and pen are tempted to exaggeration and unreliable utterances; thieves and forgers are active and the criminal classes are here excited to fresh deeds of violence and cruelty. Persons born as indicated in the paragraph for the 14th instant are again admonished to have care in all their affairs.

23—Wednesday. Urge general business during the 23-Wednesday. Urge general business during the forenoon but look out for the pennies during the afternoon when extravagance is incited and unsatisfactory purchases are induced; the evening is fine for social engagements, or musical or dramatical entertainments.

gagements, or musical or dramatical entertainments.

24—Thursday. Take this day for all minor dealings with the laboring classes and transacting business with plumbers, tinners, gardeners and builders; let persons born about the 20th of January, April, July or October of past years, if compelled to be employed in underground places or about chemicals and machinery, have particular care in these last days of April for avoidance of harm from fire, accident or explosion.

from fire, accident or explosion.

25—Friday. The early part of the day is the best, though on the whole the day is but an indifferent one; some unusual mental and nervous unrest among mankind will be noted at these times by close observers and the classes engaged in great literary works will be observed to be suffering unusual misfortunes and some persons noted in literary circles are likely to succumb under prevailing adverse conditions.

26—Saturday. Use the early morning hours for minor purchases of goods for trade, though articles of dress or decoration are best left unbought; do not court or marry on this day, particularly if acquaintance of parties is short. Better wait a while.

27—Sunday. The afternoon is best; the mind will be remarkably active and pulpit utterances full of vigor and zeal; mental efforts in the evening will be effective and literary productions satisfactory.

28—Monday. Rise early and push all literary work and general correspondence with energy; seek favor at the hands of thine employer and crowd all honorable un-the hands of thine employer and crowd all honorable undertakings.

29—Tuesday. Give preference to the forenoon for pursuit of the elegant occupations, dealings in fancy goods, jewelry and all articles that please and gratify mankind; have no dealings in houses or lands in the afternoon which is less promising of good than the early hours.

30-Wednesday. The month closes with a very excitable and unfortunate day; keep out of contentions, engage no servants, do not travel needlessly, and be sure to "make haste slowly" in thy respective avocations; beware of giving offence to thine employer.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ATS constructed entirely of tissue paper sounds unpracticable, but as a matter of fact they can be made in such a way as to stand the wear and tear of climate much better than those made of chiffon and tulle, which are worn now-which are worn nowadays on even the most ordinary occasions.

The idea originated in the manual department of the public schools, where the girls are taught to braid tissue paper and to sew it together forming hats of various sizes and shapes. Out of this grew the fashion of making the paper hats form a part of the outfit of the children of the family, and this practical use of that which at first was only a plaything, became a really useful thing, and the fad grew, as such fads will grow, until few girls there are who do not possess at least one of these dainty creations.
And it is not only confined to the children and girls, for the young lady sister does not scorn possess at least one of these dainty creations. And it is not only confined to the children and girls, for the young lady sister does not scorn to wear them also.

These hats are built in exact imitation of the fashionable hats of the season. The tissue paper braided forms a very good imitation of the popular fancy braids, and if colors are harmoniously combined, a very pleasing effect is obtained. One distinct advantage in having these hats is that the cost is so slight that one may have a hat to wear with every suit, and it will be a great satisfaction to know that your hat cost only a few cents instead of several dollars. Tissue paper can be purchased for a penny a sheet, and from ten to twenty sheets are required for the hat according to the style.

The milliners complain that it is a great detriment to their trade. A down town milliner said to me the other day: "You would be surprised to know how much the paper hats are injuring my spring trade, especially in children and misses' hats;" and she added: "I am sure we will find the same difficulty all through the summer and even into the fall. Our hats are being copied by all the enterprising young people, and I cannot but admire the skill with which it is done. There is a copy of one of my spring hats now; just look at it and I will show you the original after she leaves the store." I looked and sure enough there was a dainty-looking lady wearing a hat in perfect imitation of one of Madame Armstrong's pattern hats. "She was in here the other day and examined this pattern hat," said Madam, "as I supposed with a view of buying it, but it seems that I was mistaken." It was really laughable to have such a timely illustration.

Our initial shows a picture of this selfsame hat. It is of black and dull red (old red) paper, two strands of black and one of red being braided for the foundation. The crown is high and very small, the brim very wide in front, with scarcely no brim at the back. Around the crossed ends prinned with a fancy pin. Directly in front is a large bow of red, and black a great detriment to their trade. A down town milliner said to me the other day: "You would a large bow of red and black deftly combined. The whole is so as the milliner said, so "chic".

Another hat is of statement of said, so "chic". as the milliner said, so "chie".

Another hat is of white tissue paper. It has a Tam O'Shanter crown, with a wide, full brim. The fullness of the brim is made by a constant widening of the crown. No wire is used. The only trimming is a band of turquoise blue paper drawn tightly around the crown, and a very large bow of the same shade directly in front.

One hat is made of dark brown paper. It has a broad flat crown, with a wide, drooping brim. Around the crown is a band of pale yellow paper. On the left side is a full blown yellow rose, and drooping carelessly on the brim, slightly lower, is a half open bud of a darker shade.

slightly lower, is a half open bud of a darker shade.

A dainty confection is shown in the Violet hat, and a proud young miss of fifteen is the artist who constructed it. It is made entirely in the violet shades, and the little blonde is a picture for an artist in it.

The hat is of the palest violet. It has a low crown and a wide brim after the "shed-roof" style. The crown runs into the broad, drooping brim. Carelessly strewn on it are large bunches of violets—also of paper—some of lighter and some of darker shades.

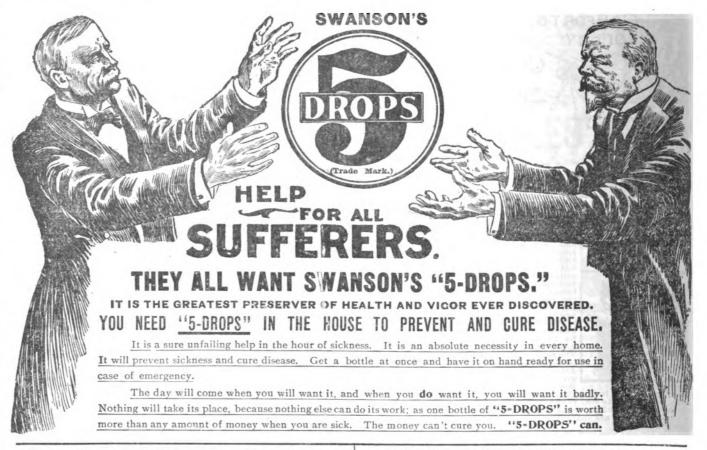

The last hat shown is perhaps the most graceful of any of the group. It is of light tan, has a very small, low crown, and a wide half drooping brim. Around the crown is drawn tightly a band of dark pink, and a large bow of the same shade is placed directly in front. On the brim across the front are carelessly arranged four large Amer-

roses. At the left side, near the back are two more roses. Among the roses green leaves are scattered. The stems are of paper twisted tight, no wire being used. This hat has a bandeau of pink and tan, so as to set the hat forward.

It is possible to copy any bat, but requires a certain amount of milliners' skill, or at least artistic taste. Many of the young ladies, taking the cue from "little sister," are constructing distracting affairs from this simple mate-

It is erroneously believed that the word pickle is derived from the name of William Benkels of Bierfleet, Holland, the inventor of pickled herrings. The real origin is the Dutch word pekel, meaning brine.

Pianofortes were invented by Schroeder of Dresden in 1717. Square pianos were first made in Saxony in 1760. The first record of the use of one in England was in 1767. They were probably in use in America very soon after that.

Water has one property in which it differs from all other known substances—it expands under the influence of either heat or cold. It is at its greatest density at 40 degrees, and from this expands into steam at 212 and into ice at 32 degrees.

Isinglass is a corrupted form of the German name of the stung, hausenblas. It is made from the bladder of the sturgeon. It probably received its English name from some improper association with the word "icing," and the French "glace, ice."

SYNOPSIS.

(Synopsis. Cap. Skote Gregg of Hobb's Harbor, Me, master of the coaster Susan P. Gregg, meets a fascinating widow while visiting his cousin in Newport, R. I. He shows such attentions to her that his cousin's wife threatens to inform her old friend, Sophy Maxwell in Hobb's Harbor, to whom Cap. Gregg has been engaged for thirty years. The captain, on his nex 'isit to Newport, sends his man of all work of the sch ner to carry a message to the widow. The young man, who is offended because the captain is betraying Sophy Maxwell, returns with the alarming message that the widow is married again and that her husband is in full chase. The Susan is hustled out of Newport Harbor and all sail is made for the coast of Maine. On the way, after the captain asserts over and over that he is glad that he has found out in time what a deceiver the widow is, Seth, the crew, confesses that he "only made believe" go to the widow's house. He imagined from what the captain was saying that he was cured of his infatuation. But Gregg chases the boy up the mast and he is still clinging in the rigging when the captain works the schooner single handed into Hobb's Harbor).

HE arrival of the Susan P. Gregg was an event at Hobb's Harbor, because nearly every one in village expected some sort of package by her. Cap. Gregg always sailed for Ne.v. York loaded with commissions.

She had been sighted off Cow Nubble and the populace was down to the wharf in numbers.

"That air Seth is actin' blame queer aboard the Susan," commented Uncle Jote Wall, peering under his hand. "He's squatting up there in the top and he hain't turnin' his head to help handle ship."

This attitude of Seth became more noticeable as the Susan was brought to her moorings. He remained motionless. Occasionally there was a bit of a dialogue between him and the skipper. The words were inaudible, but all noticed that at the close of the discourse Cap. Gregg always shook his fist at the fellow aloft.

When the Susan had sogged in near enough to be hailed, Uncle Jote Wall quavered out over the waters, "Hey, Cap'n of the Susan Gregg, ahoy! What ye got in your riggin'? Mother Carey's chicken?"

"Naw, it's a henhawk," bawled back the skipper. "Anybody got a gun?"

But the crowd on the wharf thought it was all a joke and laughed. It looked more serious when, after making all tidy as best he could, the skipper came ashore in the only boat and left Seth still clinging aloft. They could hear what he yelled back to the culprit this time.

"You mis'able finback shark!" shouted Gregg, again shaking his fist. "Git ashore as best ye can and when ye do git ashore remember I'm lookin' for ye. There's one lickin' due ye now. If ye let on what it's about I'll kill ye. Now that's fair warnin'."

"What's all the touse between you and Seth about," questioned Uncle Jote Wall while Capt. Stote was shaking hands on the wharf.

"It's private business 'twixt him and me,' returned Skote shortly. 'Tain't anything for just their secret and no one's else-the whole any of ye to be askin' questions about, not unless ye want to rile me-and ye know what I am when I'm riled."

There had been occasions in the village when Capt. Skote Gregg had been "riled" and his neighbors remembered them. They forebore therefore to ask questions, that is, of Cap. Gregg, but at last, when the skipper had trudged away up the hill to his house, a man brought the trembling Seth ashore in a dory, the questions were fired at him broadside. But Seth backed away from the throng on the wharf, every now and then throwing an apprehensive eye over his shoulder towards the skipper's house as though he expected that worthy and wrathy individual to come bolting down the hill like a Bengal tiger.

"Go right away from me," cried Seth, flapping his hands in protest. "I'm in all the trouble I want to be without any more help. I hain't goin' to say a word to no one. 'Tain't no one's bus'ness."

"We'll stand behind ye," said Chep Grant, "if the skipper's tryin to bulldoze ye. We won't let him hurt ye ' "That's all right to neke talk that was " the sole of my foot."

whined Seth. "But none of ye won't git 'round till after the hurtin' 's all over and then ye'll take it out in puttin' flowers on my coffin and sayin' how too bad it was. No, Itell ye! Don't his boots. ask me no more questions and I won't tell ye no more lies."

He escaped and ran away to his home. He was no more communicative to his own relatives. It can be easily understood how the mysterious falling out between Gregg and Seth became the absorbing topic of the village. And the eternal skirmish drill between the skipper and his "crew" also excited the populace. Whenever the captain walked about his place he kept his eye out for the recreant crew. Seth never went sharply around a corner. He always took a wide swing and reconnoitered. Once or twice the skipper had got near enough to warrant a chase. But Seth escaped each time.

The sporting instincts of some of the younger men of the village were aroused. Bets were made as to whether the skipper would catch Seth. The advent of either on the street was a call for all the loafers to post themselves advantareously to see whatever might happen.

Finally, so acute did the curicsity of the village become that duress was attempted on Seth. He was cornered one night in the grocery store by some of the lobster fishermen and was informed that unless he gave up the secret there and then one of them would go fetch the skipper and the others would hold him. Seth, in the store until the doughty mariner arrived.

"Go 'long, go and git me murdered if ye want to," cried Seth, almost blubbering. "I've been reckoning ye would. Ye are allus mixin' into things that hain't your bus'ness round this dog-goned place. Go ahead and after I'm dead you'll be sorry."

Seth's distress was so acute that it was decided after conference to allow him to go.

But it is sad to relate that though the young man dauntlessly faced this strenuous ordeal he was in danger of being ruined by petty circumstances as insinuating as little serpents. Sometimes the mighty rock that the blast cannot split may be divided by water poured on wooden wedges. It was the Sims girl that proved the undoing of this village Samson of secrecy. She kept at him early and late to tell her why the skipper had become so angered at him. Behind the Sims girl the skipper's sister was standing, poking her on. The skipper's sister couldn't get even a grunt out of the skipper himself.

If Seth had but known, the skipper was now anxious to meet him and talk the thing over amicably and arrange for a permanent truce. But Seth was not to be come at. He flew even from the captain's ingratiating beckonings at a distance, ever suspecting guile.

Gregg feared just the danger that was now encompassing Seth—the everlasting coaxing and nagging of an inquisitive woman. At last the Sims girls ceased taunting him of pusillanimity and indicated that he didn't love her and if he didn't he might go his way. Seth valiantly resisted these assaults. Then the Sims girl said she had heard it on good authority that Seth had been caught stealing from the cargo. She allowed that if he didn't clear his character it was "good-bye Joe" between them. One night when Seth persisted in keeping his secret even in the face of this ultimatum the Sims girl turned him out of the house, threw at him in a bunch all the varied assortment of taunts and allegations she had been rehearsing and shut the door on him. She declared that it was forever.

Seth sat on the corner of the banking for half an hour and blubbered. His siege had been a nerve-racking one. His tears were excusable. The Sims girl sat close to the parlor window and listened. Just as she was about to call him back and tell him that she loved him and wouldn't tease him any more, Seth's resolution gave a last despairing flop and died. He went along and tapped on the door.

"Let me in," he called, "and I'll tell ye for I s'pose I've got to." By this narrow margin was he defeated. But it is ever thus in the world's battles.

Under pledge of secrecy—that it should be story was told to the Sims girl. Then she hurried Seth away so that she could go over and dump the whole horrible, awful, disgraceful, shameful tale in the ears of the skipper's spinister sister, July Ann. What! Cap. Skote Gregg break the engagement to Sophy Maxwell, the best woman Hobb's Harbor ever had? The Sims girl fully realized what a bomb-shell she was carrying.

The Sims girl was nearly out of breath when she arrived in July Ann's kitchen but she was able to gasp out the skeleton of the affair, to be filled in later. It was fortunate for July Ann that the thing was broken to her in this manner by degrees, otherwise she certainly must have died of strangulation. She gripped her throat and popped her eyeballs. By turns she wept for the woes of the betrayed Sophy and raged over the skipper's deception of herself.

"Wasting his time and substance on a Jezebel, and me ownin' ha'f that schooner," she gritted. "And then when he brings her here to the old home I shall have to go forth like the dove from the ark with no place for

"If you lit some one would up and tell you to come off your perch, birdie," mumbled the hired man who sat behind the stove tallowing

"What's that ye're havin' over?" screamed July Ann, detecting satire.

"I only said, mum," replied the hired man, raising his voice, "that it wa'n't in no ways right for a man that 'tended church." He shouted the last word. July Ann glared at him suspiciously for a moment and continued.

"I'm goin' right now to tell the elder and then I shall call 'round to Sophy's house and show her what a villun she has been nussin' in her bosom."

The hired man chuckled but stooped and made believe talk to the cat. July Ann snapped her hood on her head and tied the strings with trembling fingers, talking all the time-now with tears, now with fire flashing from her eyes. As she left the kitchen she whirled and shook her fist at the "copied picture" of the skipper gazing blandly on the scene from the sitting room beyond.

"And if ever a man in this world will wish that his cake was dough and the devil had it, that man will be you, Skote Gregg, when ye git back home tomorrer." Then she slammed the door and went rasping down the pebbly path, the Sims girl gasping along behind.

"Looks kind o' like 's if Cap's good angel don't bring him some kind of warnin' he's li'ble to think he's made a mistake and dropped into a camp of Tuscaroory Injuns when he gits home," pon lered the hired man. "Now let's see! Shall I warn him? If I do July Ann will cook my goose. If I don't he's goin' to have his harselet curled. Men folks ought to stand by men folks, I s'pose, but I jest reckin that I hain't called on to grab into this game. It's too casartin. If I only knowed who was comin' out on top-but I don't."

The hi - 1 man put the cat in the woodshed and went to bed. He decided that the affair was in the hands of Providence and that he wouldn't interfere.

Cap. Gregg had been up country for a few days buying pressed hay to make another car-go to New York. He was expected home on the morrow. And he came. Hours before his arrival every person in the village of Hobb's Harbor understood the situation of affairs and knew that Cap. Skote was coming back to fall into an ar suscade. Vantage points from which the anair could be witnessed were in as great a demand as seats along the route of the coronation procession of King Edward.

Now Cap. Gregg had not studied the whirls of weather-breeding clouds, the menace of skies, the signs of tempest all his life in vain. And his eye by instinct was peeled for land squalls as well. When he approached Hobb's Harbor the unwonted stir among the populace attracted his keen attention. Despite the frantic protests of July Ann the sight-seers had persisted in crowding up around the house until the premises looked as though an auction were in progress.

At the turn of the lane leading to his home Cap. Gregg reined up his fuzzy white horse and cocked his eye up to a boy who had posted himself in the crotch of a leaning willow "What is the' goin' on up to my place, bub?" he asked. "Hain't no trouble, is the'?"

"Not yit," returned the boy briefly, shifting his chew of gum.

The skipper gazed at the youngster awhile, then looked toward the house with his lids drooping half down over his eyes in a calculating stare. "I hain't lived man and boy in this place for goin' on fifty-five year without knowin' some of the ways of the folks here," he soliloquized. "It's out-that's jest what's the trouble, and they're up to see the finish. Here's where I shorten sail and ratch up, with an eye to breakers over the lee."

He drove along slowly. His suspicions were deepened by the fact that the persons who had assembled were pretending not to notice his arrival. But he knew that every eye was watching him and his pride wouldn't allow him to halt. He drove into the yard and swung his legs out over the wheel.

"If this is a public reception," he bawled sarcastically to some men standing in his barn door, "why don't the band strike up? I'm here!"

"From what I hear inside I guess the band's gittin' ready to strike," drawled one of the men. "But I shouldn't say it was Susy's band. It sounds more like a band of loocivees with turpentine sprinkled on 'em."

Then the skipper heard the well known tones of July Ann's voice screaming maledictions.

"I tell you I will-I will," she cried. "Don't ye try to stop me. I will have his heart for mincemeat-I will."

The next instant from the crater of the kitchen door the valcano erupted. Ahead came July Ann, wrestling with Aunt 'Liza Shaw for the tongs, with which it appears July Ann was vowing to commit murder. Behind came Sophy Maxwell, her face expressing sorrow rather than anger. In the "also ran" crowd were half the women of Hobb's Harbor. Popping from July Ann's mouth were disjointed sentences about "widow-painted Jezebel-woman of Babylon."

Then Cap. Gregg understood full well that it was all out. He was never accounted a coward BIGGER BOX SAME PRICE THE MODERN STOVE POLISH Brilliant, Clean, Easily Applied. Absolutely Odorless by men. In fact, his reputation ran the other way. But above all Cap. Gregg, like a masteri. general, knew when to retreat. He knew what July Ann was when she was well started. Furthermore, there would be neither credit nor profit in a pitched battle with his sister there before the eyes of the assembled villagers.

July Ann was within striking distance. He uttered one hoarse shout of protest, then he dodged under the belly of the white horse, staggered along a few feet to recover his balance and started on the dead run down the street. July Ann screaming with rage followed and all the people chased behind her. The were simply following to be in at the death spectators, but a stranger looking on would have concluded that Skipper Gregg was being chased from town by a wild mob. He looked behind once and his fears suggested that the whole village was raised against him because he had been unfaithful to Sophy Maxwell.

"This is what comes of livin' under the nose of people," he gasped as he ran. "I've got to make that schooner ahead of 'em-and I'll kill the man that tries to stop me." He shouted this threat for a group of men had assembled at the foot of the lane.

THE table before three men who for two hours had been shut into the private office of Goald & Stauchs, brokers, Wall street, New York, a neat walnut box stood open. One of them snapped the lock, dropped the box into a leather case that looked as if it might contain a kodak, took the box by the strap and his hat from the table, and started for the door. Mr. Goald looked inquiringly across the table at his partner. The latter held up one hand with the fingers and thumb widely separated.

"We'll make it five hundred thousand, if you succeed," said Mr. Goald, aloud, speaking to the back of the man who was leaving the room. The man turned around at the door.

"Now you're talking business," he said. "Make out the papers," he added, as he came back to the table.

Some of the city papers, two days later, in printing the lists of steamer passangers in-cluded in the annual migration of the season printing the lists of steamer passangers included in the annual migration of the season to Europe, commented on the coincidence that three men who in place of their real names may be called Mr. Smith, Mr. Jones and Mr. Brown, were all passengers on one steamer, and that the three probably represented more money than any other three men who could be brought together in America. One of the papers even figured up the number of hundred millions worth of stocks and bonds which they owned or controlled, while another paper gave a description of the palatial accommodations which they had engaged on board the steamer for themselves, their families and servants.

"Hello, Jones!" said Mr. Smith, as the man he addressed came hurrying on board the steamer at almost the last second. "I thought you were going to be left."

"I thought so, too," said Mr. Jones, stopping to take breath and light a cigar. "My valet was taken violently ill not more than an hour ago, and went to the hospital. I didn't know anything about it until he sent a new man to take his place—his cousin, he said. It made us late. I only hope the fellow can shave me comfortably. He looks decent enough," following with his eyes as he spoke, the smoothshaven man who had come on board behind him and who was now disappearing down a passageway with his hands full of luggage.

shaven man who had come on board behind him and who was now disappearing down a passageway with his hands full of luggage.

For four days the Keramic plowed across the Atlantic ocean toward Europe, and in the evening of each one of these days the three money kings gathered in the private cabin of Mr. Jones' magnificent suite of rooms, and talked business. The host's new valet, who had proved to be a first-class man, his master said, waited on the three men when anything was business. The host's new valet, who had proved to be a first-class man, his master said, waited on the three men when anything was wanted, and brought cigars, seltzer, matches, writing paper, whatever they might call for. When not engaged in this way the man retired from the room, but retired, if the men in the cabin had only known it, into a stateroom from behind the curtains of which he could hear and did hear every word of their conversation.

About eleven o'clock of the fourth evening, Mr. Jones gathered up a few small sheets of paper from the table, covered with memoranda in pencil, and handing copies to each of the other two men, kept one himself.

"It's going to be a big thing," he said, as he put his own copy into a leather letter case and returned the case to his pocket.

"The biggest thing yet," added Mr. Brown, lighting a cigar as he rose to go.

"Well, good night."

An hour later a man with a black box under his arm crept silently along the deck towards the stern of the boat, carefully steering his course so as to avoid detection by the men on watch.

Arrived at the extreme stern he looked about him. A part of the superstructure of the deck hid him entirely from the sight of any one out at that late hour.

The night was calm and beautiful. The mass of rushing, churning water which the powerful screws beneath him left in the steamer's path was sinking into the ocean.

The man who had crept along the deck in the shadows paid little heed to the beauty of the shadows paid little heed to the blank how here. that he had brought with him on the deck, he took from it another box of polished wood, and opening this balanced it on the steamer's rail. Even in that dim light the gleam of shinrail. Even in that dim light the gleam of shining metal was visible.

I Grasping the box with his left arm to steady it upon the railing, the man began to manipulate the apparatus in it with his right hand.

So intent was he on what he was doing that he did not hear steps behind him on the deck, and it was not until the watch, within six feet of him sang out, "What's going on here?" that he rnew that he was not alone.

In the same instant the box on the rail, with its shining metals, slipped from beneath his arm into the boiling water behind the boat.

"Just trying to get a night exposure of this steamer's wake," he answered calmly, turning to face the watchman, now standing beside him. "You startled me so you made me drop my camera overboard. You ought to be more "careful."

"The hell I had," retorted the sailor. you know that nobody is allowed on this part of the deck at this time of night? You get below Here, take your box with you," kicking the leather case along the deck after the retreat-

"I teckon I ought to pull him in to the mate," the sailor grumbled to himself, as the man went out of sight, "and I would if he wan't a son of cabin boy to that rich old cuss what's so free with his money. I guess I'll let him go."

Mr. Ambrose Stauchs, of the firm of Goald & Stauchs, had a summer home on the extreme eastern end of Long Island. The house had not yet been opened for the season when its

"And, oh, yes! I say, Wise," coming back on, yes: I say, wise," coming back to speak close to the station master's ear, "I just as lief you wouldn't say anything to anybody about my being here."
"Sure, Mr. Stauchs, I won't, then," was the reply.

It was the day after the Keramic sailed, that It was the day after the Keramic sailed, that the two men took up their quarters in the otherwise unoccupied summer residence. From that time on, so soon as the apparatus could be put in place, one or the other of the men watched day and night in a darkened room into which had been brought a wire from the flag staff on the observatory of the house. Connected with the wire in the darkened room was a tiny mirror hung by a thread so that its slightest movement would send a ray of light, reflected from it, dancing over a sheet of paper crossed with lines as intricate as those on a Chinese puzzle.

Chinese puzzle.

One day passed, and another, and the mirror hung motionless. Early in the evening of the third day—the fourth day after the sailing of the Keramic—the broker watching in the darkness saw the mirror move. The spark of light swept across the lines upon the paper, and stopped.

Like a flash the broker darted into an adjoining room, where his companion was as-leep, and shaking him, cried, "It's come! Quick! See what it says!"

Side by side the two men bent over the mirror. The spark was moving again, now, and continued to move, going from space to space

The point of light stopped moving, and although the two men watched it until the last minute came that the broker could stay, and yet catch the only train that would get him to the city by morning—and his companion watched it all night—it never moved again. The wireless telegraph instrument that had been operating it from hundreds of miles away was gone down to the bottom of the Atlantic ocean, thrown overboard to escape detection.

The next day men in Wall street said that Goald & Stauchs must be hard up, so persistently were they realizing on every negotiable security they had, but as the day passed, and no trouble came to the firm the gossips said they must have been wrong, and wondered what deep laid scheme the brokers had up their sleeves.

The next day's cable announced the safe ar-sleeves.

The next day's cable announced the safe arrival of the Keramic in England, with all on board well.

A little later and it began to be rumored in the financial world that a stupendous deal was on foot. Just what, no one seemed to really know, or else would not say. Then there was another rumor that there was a hitch somewhere, and three days of uncertainty and surmise passed.
Then came the news of The Great Deal—the Then came the news of The Great Deal—the combination that electrified America and staggered the rest of the world.

Men who were out of it, and everybody was out of it except the people associated with the three organizers of the scheme wondered how a firm of mere brokers like Goald & Stauchs ever got into the deal.

They never found out, nor did the money kings themselves ever learn how it came about that this one firm had become acquainted with their plans so prematurely as to be able to fix themselves so as to defeat the entire project unless they themselves were allowed to come into less they themselves were allowed to come into the deal.
